That there can be no separate "State" established by the Jews alone, is clearly proven also, from the fact, that Jesus, during his ministry on earth, told them distinctly in the parable of the householder, (see Matt. 21: 33 to end of the chapter) in verse 43, "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." And, foreseeing that he would be rejected by the Jews, he had already prepared for the preaching of the kingdom, when he sent forth his disciples on their first mission (Matt. 10: 5-7), "Go not into any way of the Gentiles, and enter not into any city of the Samaritans: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." So, also, he said to the Canaanitish woman (Matt. 15: 24), "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." These statements of Jesus prove also, that the nation, who would bring forth the fruits of the kingdom, was the house of Israel, the former brethren of the house of Judah.

That Zionism, in its present manifestation, will prove an utter failure, is also shown from its prophetic attitude to the Turkish nation, for how can the Jews as a people expect any permanent help from a people already foredoomed to destruction, for read carefully the Book of Obadiah, which consists of only one chapter, and note the punishment of Edom (Esau is Edom, Gen. 36: 1) for the oppression of his brother Jacob. Now Jacob is generic of both the house of Israel and the house of Judah, and not only so, but very much more has come to pass, the Eastern question is settled, and the Turks are not only driven out of Europe, but also cut off as a people from the ancient land of all Israel, for (ver. 21) "Saviours shall come upon Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau, and the kingdom shall be the Lord's." United Israel now inherit their ancient possessions, and it is no longer a question about Zionism (the house of Judah) for the Jews are known to be everywhere, but who and where is the house of Israel? The answer to this question will indeed be the romance of all history.

HOME FOR LITTLE WANDERERS

AMONG the many beneficent institutions conducted in New England, the Home for Little Wanderers, at 202 W. Newton street, Boston, is doubtless one of the most notable, by reason of the excellent work it is doing for the poor little homeless waifs. It is undenominational. The superintendent and other officers are chosen with regard for their special qualification for the responsible spiritual relation they sustain to the children under their care. Needy children are placed in this home until they are adopted into permanent homes, or returned to their parents, if the latter should then be in more favorable circumstances than before. The Home was organized in 1865, and chartered for the purpose of "rescuing children from want and shame, providing them with food and clothing, giving them instruction in mind and heart, and placing them, with the consent of their parents or guardians, in Christian homes." In the homes where they are ultimately placed, they are treated as sons and daughters, and they continue to be under the supervision of the Board of Managers. When not properly treated or cared for, they are removed. Legal adoption is encouraged. A person making application for a child is required to present a recommendation signed by the pastor of the congregation and two reputable citizens. Any orphan or homeless child not under two years of age, mentally and physically sound, who, under the instruction and good influences of the Home, is capable of becoming a worthy member of a respectable family, can receive the aid of this charity. The Board of Managers reserve the right to return to friends any child who, after trial, shall be found unfit for a home.

Missionary agents are employed to assist the Superintendent. Six different denominations are now represented on the Board of Managers; nor are its labors and benefits limited to children of any denomination, sect, locality, or color. Up to May 1, 1902, thirty-seven years, it has received and provided for nine thousand, eight hundred and fifty-seven orphan, destitute, and homeless children.

This Home is not supported by state, city, or town funds, but by contributions from all who may be interested in the work.

The Superintendent, Rev. V. A. Cooper, D.D., writes: "We are free from debt. Our property cost $125,000. We have succeeded in paying the expenses every year. Kind friends by gifts and legacies have given money to the Home, so that the income from invested funds alone is nearly half enough to meet our current expenses. Ninety-eight children are in the Home now. One hundred and seventy-four have been placed in homes in different States last year, to be treated as sons and daughters. The means of grace have been steadily maintained. We have religious services adapted to the child understanding, moral lessons they could appreciate, steady drill in committing religious hymns to memory and learning to sing them correctly, the Reform Army meetings twice a month, and regular Sunday School. There are no better children anywhere than the boys and girls we place in homes, and it does not seem to make much difference how deep and dark the hole of the pit out of which they were dug. A Christian environment is more than a match for human depravity."

Helping Wayward Boys

THE Charlton Industrial Farm School, a Christian family home for wayward and homeless boys, was founded in 1896 by Mr. John S. Hawley, of New York, who donated $25,000 for this purpose. The institution is situated within two miles and a half of Charlton village, in Saratoga County, N. Y., where Mr. Hawley was born. It is a big brick building, three stories high, surrounded by a farm of two hundred acres. The live stock consists of five horses, twenty-five to thirty head of cattle, thirty to forty hogs, and one hundred fowls.

Here, in addition to their regular studies, the boys are taught to be practical agriculturists. The school is intended to be a home rather than what is generally understood by an institution. But the boys must work. In return they receive regular wages. Out of these they pay for their own clothing and such other things as they may require. Only their board is provided free. The wages, however, are sufficiently liberal to allow the boys to save money. Some of the boys, on leaving the home, have started out with a capital of from eighteen to twenty-five dollars—the result of their own industry.

The boys are given a careful religious training. On Sunday morning, dressed in their military suits, they ride to church and school in one of the farm wagons, a distance of two and a half miles. It is little homeless waifs of from seven to twelve years of age who are qualified to enter the school, and the authorities are ready to welcome any worthy applicants.

Those who wish to know more about the institution can do so by corresponding with James S. Sweetman, M.D., the Secretary and Treasurer of the Industrial Farm School, Charlton, Saratoga Co., N. Y.

"Look a Little Pleasanter"

ACTING on a sudden impulse, an elderly woman, the widow of a soldier who had been killed in the Civil War, went into a photographer's to have her picture taken. She was seated before the camera wearing the same stern, hard, forbidding look, that had made her the object of fear to the children living in the neighborhood, when the photographer, thrusting his head out of the black cloth, said suddenly, "Just brighten the eyes a little!" She tried, but the dull and heavy look still lingered. "Look a little pleasanter," said the photographer, in an unimpassioned but confident and commanding voice. "See here," the woman returned sharply, "if you think that an old woman who is dull can look bright, that one that feels cross can become pleasant every time she is told to, you don't know anything about human nature. It takes something from the outside to brighten the eye and illuminate the face." "Oh, no, it does not! It is something to be worked up from the inside. Try it again," said the photographer good naturedly; something in his manner inspired faith, and she tried it again, this time with better success. "That is good, that is fine, you look twenty years younger," exclaimed the artist, as he caught the transient glow that illumined the faded face. She went home with a queer feeling in her heart. It was the first compliment she had received since her husband had passed away, and it left a pleasant memory behind.

When the picture came, it was like a resurrection. The face seemed alive with the fires of youth. She gazed long and earnestly, then said in a clear, firm voice, "If I can do it once, I can do it again"; approaching the little mirror above her bureau, she said, "Brighten up, Catharine," and the old light flashed up once more. "Look a little pleasanter," she commented; and a calm and radiant smile diffused itself over her face. Her neighbors soon remarked the change that had come over her face. "Why, Mrs. A., you are getting young! How do you manage it?" "It is almost all done from within," she replied with a smile; "you just brighten up inside and feel pleasant."

Columbus and his sailors landed and erected the wooden cross. It used to be notable also for the sponge fisheries, but there is not much of these now. I have heard it said that there were times in Nuevitas when a drop of fresh water was worth its weight in gold. It has no source of supply, and when the rain water, which is caught in cisterns, gives out, the supply is brought from other towns in barrels.

The inland town of Puerto Principe has a curious history. It is called by Spanish historians "the Mediterranean city," but not through any fanciful memory of the Mediterranean Sea, which washes the shores of southern Spain. When the town was founded it was on the north coast. The pirates and the buccaneers then nested in the Bahama Islands and were wont to descend on the coast settlements of the Spaniards. For safety, the authorities decided to move this settlement into the interior, and they called it the Mediterranean city, meaning midland. But in moving the town they forgot about the south coast. Morgan and his freebooters, who then ranged from Jamaica to Panama, had their hiding-places in the Isle of Pines on the south coast of Cuba. Once when they were there dividing the booty, the pirate chief took some of his followers and went along the coast till they found a landing place, which was almost directly south of Puerto Principe. He took his pirates overland and surprised and attacked the town. The settlers, led by the alcalde or mayor, made a most heroic defense, but finally were overcome, and the place was pillaged and burned by the buccaneers, who murdered many of the inhabitants. The heroic mayor was killed during the defense. The freebooters carried away with them everything that was worth taking, but the plucky settlers rebuilt the town. Morgan's attack was in 1668, and there were other thrilling episodes in its later history.

The town of Puerto Principe to-day is the quaintest one in all Cuba. More of old Spain is to be seen here than in any other part of the Island. The streets are very narrow, and from some of the overhanging balconies, which themselves are curious, it seems as if two people could reach across and shake hands. The houses are very old, and the doors and windows are said to be exact reproductions of some of the very ancient times of Spain.

It is here that is found the Cuban volante, in daily use. Scores of these vehicles travel up and down the narrow streets, and when the stranger steps off the train he can have his choice of a dozen styles. I confess to feeling some resentment on my last visit on seeing that a few modern cabs had been introduced. They are out of place here in the midst of old Cuba and old Spain. Something too much of modern improvements is shown by them.

Puerto Principe is the home of some notable Cuban families who bear names that were celebrated in Spain centuries ago. It also boasts, and justly, of the Moorish beauty of the women. Most of its leading families were accustomed to sending their sons to the United States to be educated. The inhabitants of Puerto Principe always have been noted for their opposition to Spanish rule and they did their full share in the struggle for liberty. A plaza or park in the centre of the town is named after Charles A. Dana, the American editor, who was a steady advocate of Cuban freedom.

A queer little railroad joins Puerto Principe with Nuevitas on the seacoast. It was one of the first railway lines built in the Island, and I believe was constructed not long after George Stephenson built the first railroad in England. Two or three times a week a mixed passenger and freight train is made up and makes a trip in order to meet the Havana boat. On this little railway the freight regulations are very strict. Passengers are not allowed to carry anything that may seem to interfere with the right of the company to collect freight. One day, riding from Nuevitas to Puerto Principe, a gentleman showed me a nice fish which he was taking home for dinner. For it, he was compelled to take out a bill of lading and pay the freight. This amounted to just one cent. I don't think any railway manager in the United States can make a better showing for his stockholders than this Cuban railway, with its bill of lading for one cent.

"Is dinner nearly ready?" questioned Helen. "I'm hungry."

"Dinner!" screamed the woman, with a thump of her fist on the table. "Dinner! my fine miss. We don't have no dinner here. If ye git anythin' ter eat, yer lucky. I guess the likes o' you don't know much how the rest of the world lives. Here, that's what Sally'd have to eat," and she handed Helen a slice of stale bread with a piece of greasy sausage on it.

Helen nibbled daintily at the edges of the bread, then laid it gently on the table. "I—I think, perhaps, after all, I am not so very hungry," she said, faintly trying to be polite.

At that moment half a dozen children of assorted ages and sizes burst noisily into the room.

"Hi, Sal, I say—you're mean—you run off!"

Mrs. Perkins chuckled. "Here, children, this ain't yer real sister. It's a gal what's put on yer sister's clo's, an' is goin' to play she's Sally for awhile. Go up an' kiss yer new sister—go on!" she urged, and pushed the motley throng toward the dismayed Helen.

The children caught the spirit of their mother's words, though but half comprehending the meaning, and fell upon the poor, defenseless child with a will, nearly smothering her in unwelcome caresses. Then they drew back and surveyed their new plaything with yells of fiendish delight. But their shouts were ominously silenced at the sound of a step outside. The door flew open with a bang, and a big, evil-eyed man, much the worse for liquor, staggered into the room. The Perkins children scampered swiftly through the back door, leaving Helen alone in the middle of the floor.

"Here, you dirty brat, git out o' my way!" snarled he, giving Helen a cruel blow.

The child cried out sharply, and Mrs.

Perkins rushed quickly to the rescue.

"Fool—you! Tain't Sally! Don't ye tech that gal—she's rich! You'll be jugged if ye hurt her. Do you understand?—jugged!"

The man looked up stupidly. "Jugged" was the only word that penetrated his dazed brain, but it was enough. He rose unsteadily to his feet, and slouched off into a corner.

Mrs. Perkins turned, not unkindly, to the little girl.

"See here, you'd better go home."

For an instant Helen looked longingly toward the door, then she shook her head.

"No; Sally's having a good time. I'm not going to have her fun spoiled. She has to have this all the time," said the child, with a little shudder. "If you'll please show me to my room I'll go to bed."

The woman gave a short laugh.

"All right; please yourself. Sat'day ain't but two days off, anyhow. As fur yer room, my fine lady—there 'tis!" and she threw open a nearby door with a flourish.

Helen, with a dumfounded expression on her face, walked into a small, ill-smelling room having two or three straw mattresses and ragged quilts on the floor.

"Here?" she gasped. "Where's my bath?"

The woman chuckled.

"Ye c'n have yer pick of beds; the rest of us 'll take what's left, seein' you're comp'ny. We don't have no 'baths'."

Tired nature conquered in the end, and when Mrs. Perkins glanced into the room twenty minutes later, Helen, still completely dressed, lay curled up like a kitten on the farthest mattress. The little girl's cheeks were tear-stained, and there was an unwonted moisture in Mrs. Perkins' eyes as she went out to hunt up her own scattered brood.

"Well, she's a spunky little piece—I snum, she is!" said the woman, under her breath.

OLD FOLKS ENJOY A HOLIDAY

THE old folks of the Kings County Almshouse (N. Y.) have had their annual holiday. It was spent at Coney Island—certainly the most remarkable place in the world—certainly the place above all others where old people should feel young.

Holidays of this kind are looked forward to. For such occasions new clothes are required. Many of them had to be provided with new garments.

When the day came 'round, the old folks were spick and span—as for seventeen years before, they, or others, had never failed to be on the morning of their annual holiday.

Only for the last two years their host has changed—the generous work of the late Mr. A. W. Parker being now carried on by Mr. J. H. Righter, of Brooklyn, who paid expenses last year. This year, the dinner was given free, as a memorial, by of tables, spread with white cloths, glittering silverware, and goblets coyly embracing Japanese napkins, with colored borders, gave promise of good things to come. And the good things came. There was soup and meat, vegetables, ice-cream, coffee—such a banquet as afterwards made a peaceful stroll on the seashore more alluring, even to the gayest of the old folk, than all the whirling and turning, all the shooting upward and downward that before had seemed so delightful.

So it was that this red-letter day came to an end. The old folks had romped like children; they went home tired, like children, at the end of a holiday.

Old Folks at Vineland

There has been, too, another "Old Folks' Day"—of a different character, to be sure, but none the less remarkable as a happy gathering of people of whom none were less than

THE OLD FOLKS' DINNER AT CONEY ISLAND

Mr. William Muller, the proprietor of the hotel. The cars were provided by friends of Mr. Heydrick. The dinner was literally a "free-will offering."

When the party arrived at the Coney Island Pier, under the charge of the Rev. Heydrick, Mr. Weyand, Mrs. Thompson, Miss Treadwell, Mr. Cavanaugh, the fun of the day began with a picnic lunch. But butter was never spread thick enough on bread, or coffee made so delicious, that it could keep people busy for long while the delights of Coney Island were still untasted. The old folks enjoyed the outing thoroughly. It certainly seemed that the cars on the switchback railways put on extra speed when they found that their passengers were old and gray-haired and wrinkled; the wooden lions and giraffes and fiery dragons in the carousel tossed and curvetted amazingly, but the old folks were not to be dismayed. There was some hesitation when it came to shooting the chutes. Some of the old men disappeared in the crowd. But nothing could daunt the old ladies. They swung round on the Ferris wheel, they visited Johnstown Flood, they tried the roller coaster, they rode bicycles, they ran the whole gamut of such experiences.

Dinner was served at two o'clock. Inside Mr. Muller's pavilion, a long array of fifty years old, and one, at least, had lived to be one hundred and five.

The occasion was a special service; the place, Vineland, N. J. It was the fifteenth annual observance of "Old Folks' Day" at the famous temperance town. Octogenarians, nonagenarians, centenarians, the bed-ridden, the crippled, old women who hobbled with sticks, old men on crutches, all came together to the number of four hundred, to hear the Rev. David H. King, D.D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, discourse on the subject of longevity. Vehicles were sent to bring to church those who were unable to walk. Invalid chairs were provided for the feeble—not a nook or cranny was overlooked.

Old folks who for years had not been out of the house took advantage of the occasion. Perhaps on account of the prize for the oldest attendant, this year's celebration eclipsed all that have gone before. Of all those who gathered in the church, the oldest was March Lamb, a negro. He says he knows he is 105, but "how much older he is not sure." Lamb is a Grand Army veteran. He thinks that beside living a religious life, his longevity is due to the hoe-cake diet which he lived on when a child slave, and which his wife still prepares for him every day.

At the conclusion of Dr King's sermon, four little girls dressed in white presented every person past 80 years of age with a bouquet of lovely flowers. Flowers held in aged hands—there is in this a thought inexpressibly beautiful.

Led to be a Missionary

About a year ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published an account of the Pennsylvania Bible Institute, in Philadelphia, and its work. A young man, who had read the article, came to the Institute. He had been saved as a seaman, and gave up his calling with the idea of entering the service of the Lord. He had no money to go to college, and he worked on a farm for several months to earn enough to partly pay his way. When a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing the article about the Institute came into his hands, he at once wrote and was accepted. He did well in study and personal service, and is now a candidate for missionary work in Africa.

Answered Prayers

C. S., Boundbrook, N. J., writes:

So many have given testimonies of answer to prayer in your valuable paper, that I feel it a joyous privilege to add mine to the long list. God does answer prayer, not only in the great trials of life, but in the daily relations and trials that beset us. God is daily and hourly answering our prayers. Very lately there came a great trouble in my life. The way seemed dark. I prayed very earnestly that whatever was the cause, God would remove it. A direct answer came. True, answer to prayer does not always come when or as we wish it, for God knows what is best for us; but if we are persistent, prayer meets response, if we pray, believing God will answer.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Carpenter's Shop in Nazareth

THE little town of Nazareth has now three carpenters, whose workshops adjoin one another. They are very small, and only from four to six metres wide. The soil is not paved, and the walls which support a flat roof, are roughcast. As there is no light in these little shops, save from the door, the men work on its threshold or else in the street. Sitting on the ground they make use of their feet, which they draw close together, to serve as a vise to fix the pieces of wood which they polish; or branches of elm bent in a crook, and forming very light carts, enough to transport small objects; or primitive yokes with four little perpendicular pieces, which they can put over the heads of the beasts employed in this labor. The tools are simple enough. Two trunks of caroub tree or sycamore placed on the floor, make their bench. Certainly it was in a poor little workshop of this kind that Jesus, at twelve years old, began to work.

The house of a workman in these countries is always distinct from his workshop. A house in Nazareth, where the workman comes at mid-day to take his meal and returns at night to sleep, does not have a little dome like those of Jerusalem and other parts of Syria, but has a flat roof forming a terrace. It is, in fact, built on the old Jewish plan. One enters by a little courtyard, where provisions or animals are kept; then mounting a little staircase or gallery, you come to the single room where the family eat and sleep, and carry on all domestic occupations. The traditional addition to this department is the terrace, which is reached by a few steps, and on this flat roof of glazed mortar the family meet to breathe the fresh air in the evening and to spend their leisure hours together; while in the daytime the women wash and dry their linen on the terrace, and often place upon it the grain they have collected during the dry season.

The house into which we are about to enter is that of a carpenter. The door is open, which is necessary to give light to the large room. There is a little window to give air, but not much else. At first the darkness seems complete!

What strikes one most, in the singular interior of this house, is the very little required by man unless brought into contact with modern civilization. First, there are neither beds, nor tables, nor chairs. Beds are replaced by thick mats, which are rolled up in the morning and put away. The table, which is removed when the meal is over, is sometimes a barrel, but if not, a round bit of wood on a leg eight inches high, on which is laid a disc of copper or of tin and upon which is placed the rice or vegetables for the family meal. Seats are needless, as whether they are eating or working or talking, they squat on the mats which occupy the end of the room.

These little extracts are from The Children of Nazareth a translation by Lady Herbert from the French of E. Le Cannes (Benziger Bros., New York; $1.30 net). By a charming study of Nazareth, as it appears to-day, and especially of the children of the village, the author shows how the Child Jesus lived, prayed, worked, and even played at Nazareth. The little book contains many interesting sketches, and is prettily illustrated.

Letters from Egypt and Palestine.* By Mallie Davenport Babcock. When the late Rev. Dr. Babcock sailed from New York, in February, 1901, to the Holy Land, the hope was expressed to him that he might find time to send letters to be read at the meetings of the Men's Association of his church. With his usual generosity, and careless of the labor it imposed upon him, he did not send the brief messages expected, but full records of his journeyings. These, his last letters (for he died during that absence), are published in book form under the above title. Pp. 157. $1. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

dreamed ways. Who can say how far back it goes, in what twilight of the world those earliest stones were laid! No wonder the Arabs say it was begun in the days of Cain and is older than the Tower of Babel, and that giants were the first builders and the behemoths were their beasts of burden. Think of a stone still in the quarry fourteen feet high, fourteen feet broad, and seventy-four feet long. . . . See the hill sloping north and south 3,800 feet above the sea, flanked east and west across the luxuriant valley by the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges. Look south up the gradual marble stairway approaching the portico through the colonnade of marble pillars, through the great central door into the hexagon, with its glorious pool and fountain reached by four descending steps of marble. Still look on across the water and up the steps through another arched and pillared doorway into the vast Pantheon, with its twelve shrines for the twelve gods alternately semicircular and rectangular growing out of the central court, with the altar of sacrifice and in the middle a glorious fountain, one of whose huge marble basins had been unearthed by the German Exploration Society only two days before we were there—basins with balustrades of marble enriched with heads of griffins and fauns and cupids with flower-wreaths. Look still southward and upward beyond this great Court of the Gods, up the sweeping marble ways to the crowning temple of the sun, Helio-polis Baalbec, whose glory it was to have no room, no chamber, hidden from the sun, whose walls were pillars between which the mountains and skies were framed, whose bases even towered above the worshipers' heads, and whose capitals blossomed against the blue of the heavens, and where all day long the sun sought his seeking worshipers and all night long the stars sent down their light. Add to the cyclopean vastness of this granite and marble every conceivable delicacy in relief of acanthus and lotus, of geometric pattern and interlacing vines and wreaths; people the niches with the figures of the gods and goddesses; gild the capitals again with the gold of votive gifts; fill the air with incense and the courts with worshipers, and an incomparable and indisputable testimony is here for the hunger of the human heart for God and of its incompleteness and restlessness.

We saw the sun set on the ruins, lighting them with fires of copper and amber, while the mountains beyond glowed in violet and gold. Swiftly the chill of the night fell when the daylight was gone and moonlight and mystery were on the ruins, and "our noisy years seemed moments in the being of the Eternal silence." It is not at Rome that one feels what that imperial power must have been that ruled the world, but in such remote places as this Syrian valley across the Lebanon and far away in the Land of Bashan. Straight to Great Britain she thrust out her roads and far south and east, and the hoof-beats of her horses in these far-off lands rang like the pulse-throbs that told the strength of her iron heart. One hundred and fifty miles a day her chariots and horsemen could make on her roads when the message demanded it—so Gibbon says—and it must be true, though travelers to-day can hardly believe it. Far north in the Hauran are whole cities she built, with temples, market-places, amphitheatres, and artificial lakes for naval combats. Was ever such power concentrated that radiated so far, with such unwasting force! Yet to-day Roman ruins lie here between Phœnician and Saracenic.

FRUITFUL OR FRUITLESS?

The Test of Vital Union Between Christ and His People

TENDER, and full of deep, loving meaning is the allegory of the vine, which Christ uttered in the closing hours of his ministry on earth. After many warnings and repeated assurances, the fact of Christ's approaching death had at last penetrated the understanding of the disciples. They had thought and hoped that when Christ told them of his departure, he was speaking in parables, but now they realized that the separation was at hand. They must have been bewildered at this sudden reversal of their expectations and, doubtless, concluded that his mission was about to end in failure. Knowing what was passing in their minds, Christ uttered this allegory, which was probably not understood at the time, but was clear to them when they thought upon it afterwards. He tells them, in effect, that it is through them that his mission is to come to fruition. His function in the future will not be, as in the past, to preach to the world and to teach it spiritual lessons. The disciples are to do that, but they can do it only as they draw life and strength from him. They are to be like the branches of the vine, bearing fruit through the power supplied to them. He will cure no more lepers, restore no more cripples, preach no more sermons. His function will be to give the disciples spiritual life, that they may do for the world all that he has been doing.

The idea of responsibility presented by the allegory was very impressive. The only way that Christ's work could be applied to the world and accomplish its purpose was through their lives. It was the branches bearing fruit. From the branches men must gain not only the fruit, but their knowledge of the vine. Their life and work must express his character and person. How was it possible for men so ignorant and untrained to do this? He tells them, and it is his answer alone that must have kept their sense of responsibility from crushing them. The secret of power was their union with him. That glorious life, which they had witnessed, would flow through them and would produce fruit. By themselves they could do nothing, any more than the branches of a vine could bear fruit when separated from the stem. Neither could the stem produce fruit without the branches. Henceforth Christ's work was to be interdependent. They were to be the hands and feet of the body of which he was the head. By them, and by them alone, henceforth, would men learn what he was and what he had done for them. From their changed lives, from their patience under suffering, from their self-sacrificing labors, the world must learn how far above common humanity must be he who inspired them. They must be the candle of the Lord lighting those who had never seen the sun.

The conditions of illumination have not changed. The church is still the city set on a hill that cannot be hid. Unconsciously do men still remind her of the fact when they adduce the inconsistencies of members of the church as a reason for not accepting Christ. They expect the fruit, as Christ does, and when they do not find it, the reproach falls upon Christ himself. So we see that the essential purpose of the branches, the reason for their very existence, is that they bear fruit. If they do not bear fruit, they are worse than useless; they are mischievous, because their barrenness leads men to belittle Christ's power. If men see those who bear his name, manifesting none of his spirit, careless of the sorrows and woes of others, greedy of gain, absorbed in the business and pleasures of the world, heedless of the spiritual danger of their fellows, they draw the conclusion that Christ's power is not what it is said to be and that there is nothing in religion. If Christ sees such conditions, what is his judgment? There is no ambiguity about his sentence. "Every branch in me, that beareth not fruit, he taketh away." An awful doom, the nature of which is beyond our conception. It implies, that there never was vital union with him, because those who abide in him do not bear fruit. So the test is established. We judge no man, but we have the right to conclude whatsoever a man's profession may be, that the absence of fruit in his life, the absence of the graces of the Christian character, "love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, temperance," that the branch is no part of the vine, otherwise the life of the vine would have produced the fruit. How consolatory, too, to the afflicted Christian, is the intimation of the purpose of discipline. The fruit-bearing branches are purged, or, as the Revised Version has it, cleansed. Why? Is their suffering capricious or the punishment of sin? No, they are cleansed or pruned for a definite purpose: "That they may bear more fruit."

The Aged Saint in the Little Back Room

MANY readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD doubtless remember Bella Cooke, the Christian invalid, whose remarkable life story was told in these columns several years ago. Mrs. Cooke, who has been bedridden since Sept. 1855, is a most wonderful illustration of the vitalizing and sustaining power of Christian faith, under trying conditions. In her eighty-first year, her mental faculties are still clear and active, and her heart is as full of love for Christ and as zealous in his service as ever. For many years, Mrs. Cooke's little room at No. 492 Second avenue, New York City, has been an almost sacred place, where she received calls from Christians, rich and poor, high and low, and of all denominations. They came to speak with her, pray, and to receive into their own hearts that restful consolation which seemed to pervade the little sanctuary. No one ever came there without being spiritually helped; for the strangest part of it all is that this poor, aged Christian invalid, instead of being the helpless one has been made a direct helper and a channel of blessing to others. Men tired out by business, women weary of the world's unsatisfying ways, people of all ages who were troubled in mind or body came to the propped-up saint in that little room, and found in her cheerful presence, her warm, glowing faith, and her wonderfully eloquent, yet simple and trustful prayers, all the help they needed, and they went away refreshed.

For a number of years, the poor of the tenements that surround the rear building in which Bella Cooke lives, have looked to the invalid for help and counsel in their troubles. When sickness, or hunger, or cold invaded their homes—miserable at best—it was to the little rear room they went for succor. They looked with reverence and love upon the godly woman, whose pale face always smiled a welcome. Knowing the pressure of such calls, some of the ladies who visited Mrs. Cooke occasionally made her their almoner, and in this way many very worthy poor people were assisted. In the last few years, however, a number of these generous friends have passed away, and though Mrs. Cooke still has many calls to assist the poor and needy she is unable to do so. She will gladly receive any contributions from readers who may be interested in her work, and to each contributor of twenty-five cents, and upward, she will send a fine satin souvenir bookmark. She can be addressed at 492 Second avenue, New York.

Delighted With the Bible Premium

Mrs. Estelle C. Crossville, Tenn., writes: "I was an only child; when six years old, my father brought me a beautiful doll from New Orleans. My old negro mammy said, as she handed it to me, 'Here am a little sister.' O, the joy I felt, I shall never forget. From that time to this, I have never received a present that gave me as much delight, till I received my Bible. I would not part with it for $10."

Exercise 57

1. The Athenæum was the name given originally to a famous Roman school, which was the pioneer of many European institutions devoted to science, art, and literature. 2. In not a few places the liberal arts would have fallen into ruin, but for such associations, in which men of ingenuity acted in co-operation or coalition with valued coadjutors. 3. Minerva was the goddess of wisdom in the Pantheon of Roman divinities, and her bust in heroic size figures on structures erected in the Ionic style for the promotion of the arts.

REVIEW

1. In what respect do the dissyllabic diphthongs differ from the monosyllabic diphthongs? 2. Give the series of dissyllabic diphthongs. 3. In what position are the dissyllabic written, and what may they be used to express? 4. What signs are used when a long vowel is followed by an accented short vowel? 5. When two vowels occur in succession which are not provided for by the diphthongal signs, how are they represented?

Prefixes

173. The syllable com- or con- occurring at the beginning of a word is expressed by a light dot written before the first consonant; thus, commit, community; convey, contribute.

174. When the syllable cog-, com-, con-, or cum- comes between two consonants, either in the same or in a preceding word, it is indicated by writing the syllable or word, that follows UNDER or CLOSE to the consonant or word that precedes; thus, recognize; compose, decompose; confined, unconfined; incumbent; in compliance.

175. Inter-, intro-, or enter- is generally expressed by nt; thus, interlock, introspect, enterprise. The prefix may be joined when this course does not occasion ambiguity; thus, interdict, entertain.

176. Magna-, magne-, or magni- is expressed by a disjoined ~; thus, magnanimity, magnetize, magnify.

177. Self- is represented by a disjoined circle s; thus, self-possessed, self-defence, self-conscious.

178. In- before the circled letters q or g, is expressed by a small hook, written in the same direction as the circle; thus, inspiration, instrument, inscribe, inherent, inhuman.

179. Except in the word inhuman (which cannot be mistaken for human) and its derivatives, the small hook for in is never used in negative words, that is, in words where in- would mean not. In all such cases in- must be written with the stroke ~, as hospitable, inhospitable.

Exercise 58

1. commit, community, convey, contribute, recognize, compose, decompose, confined, unconfined, incumbent, in compliance, interlock, introspect, enterprise, interdict, entertain, magnanimity, magnetize, magnify, self-possessed, self-defence, self-conscious, inspiration, instrument, inscribe, inherent, inhuman.

Exercise 59

1. Competent, complete, compass, compute, compromise. 2. Convince, condemn, condense, congratulate, Congress. 3. Recognition, recognizer; incompetent, incomplete. 4. Disconsolate, misconceive, reconsider reconcile. 5. Interlude, intermeddle, interplead, intercede, intersect. 6. Introvert, introspective, introversion; enterology. 7. Introduce, interweave, interrupted, interchange. 8. Magnanimity, magnificence, magnified, magnetized. 9. Self-love, self-righteous, self-confident; inhibit.

Exercise 60

1. "Self-praise is no recommendation," runs a well known proverb. 2. We feel that such praise is incongruous and incompatible to him who feels with Tennyson that self-reverence and self-control lead life to sovereign power. 3. We do not enjoy intercourse with those whose self-conceit is irreconcilable with their inconspicuous abilities. 4. But we love to converse with him who has enough modesty in his composition to spare us constant references to what he considers are his own magnificent enterprises. 5. We do not admire self-esteem when associated with self-will, and when he who shows it exhibits no circumspection or common sense in his communications, is not gifted with introspection, but manifests a stilted magniloquence. 6. Such a person is likely to provoke interruption, should he address any conference.

The student having advanced to this stage, is now advised to read some book printed in the Corresponding Style of shorthand, and we recommend for this purpose either of the following: Phonographic Reader or Select Readings No. 1, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand notes. Either of these works will be sent post-paid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orders should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XXI. will appear in the issue of Oct. 15.

has certainly been its field, its record in the work of magnificent charities, not only in our own country, but in India, Russia, Cuba, and China, has put it in the front rank as one of the world's greatest benefactors. Last, but not least, its work at Mont-Lawn certainly entitles it to the prayerful interest of all Christian people.

Tributes in Verse

M. D. P., Belmont, Wis., sends some verses, beginning:

Among all pleasures neath the sun,
As life's eventful course is run,
There's nothing neater gained and won—
Than CHRISTIAN HERALD's premium.

Rose T., Kalamazoo, Mich., writes:

The pictures are each one a gem,
I write, and send my thanks for them;
If purchased at the best art store,
A dollar each they'd be, or more.
You send a dozen, postpaid, free
To all the HERALD's family.
The people say they "don't see through it,"
And "don't know how you ever do it."

Grace L. H., Alpena, Mich., writes:

Of all the beautiful pictures
That hang on parlor wall,
Those of the Art Portfolio
Please us the best of all.
Not for coloring only,
Nor yet for the landscape fine,
But their beauty seems to be graven
On heart and soul and mind.

"To hold, as't were, the mirror up to Nature"

SHREDDED WHEAT WHOLE BISCUIT

Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit is the direct reflection of Nature.

It is the whole wheat—nothing added, nothing taken away. It is the NATURAL food intended by Nature for man's use, because it contains All the Properties in Correct Proportion Necessary to Nourish every Element of the Human Organism. Man's ignorance as to the uses of the different parts of the wheat was originally accountable for the removal of portions of it in order to make white flour. Custom and habit are accountable for the continuance of this vital error. Faulty bones and teeth, weak bodies and minds are the result of the white flour eating "practice."

Shake off the pale, sickly yoke and nourish every part of your God-given mind and body with NATURAL food—thrust the white bread eating habit firmly aside, be well and strong and "Bare do all that may become a man." Sold by all grocers. Send for "The Vital Question" Cook Book (Free).

A Reader's Tribute

Mr. Edward C. —, of Erie, Pa., a reader of this paper, sends us the following letter, expressive of appreciation and good will:

For a number of years it has been the custom in our family to remember each other in some way, on each recurring birthday, not so much on account of the intrinsic value of the gift, but to remind each other that they are not quite forgotten, in this world of hurry and bustle. I had a birthday on the thirteenth of July, and to my great delight I received a copy of The Life and Work of Dr. Talmage, published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—a most beautiful volume. I could not have been better pleased. The first copy I ever saw of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had a eulogy on Alexander H. Stephens, by Dr. Talmage. How many years ago that was I cannot tell, but it was a good many. Ever since that we have had THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in our home. For a long time I bought it weekly at the news stands; but for several years I have been a regular subscriber. We generally subscribe for three or four copies each year, sending them to friends as presents. The last two years I have sent it to my mother in England. They look upon it as a weekly beam of sunshine in the home. We have a great many books in our home that we have received as premiums with the paper, in the years that are gone, and I want to say that in every premium we have received, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has fully kept its promise; in every instance the premium has been even better than advertised. We like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We watch eagerly for its coming every week. We love its broad Christianity; its holding up of the Cross so that all may see with eyes unclouded by theological mists. Yes, I believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will never lack support. It has done too much good in the world to suffer from neglect. The world

“Slippery Dick”

SLIPPERY DICK is dead! On Sunday afternoon, July 20, in the old Jerry McAuley Water Street Mission, surrounded by a crowd of sympathetic converts, many of whom had traveled with him on his lawless career, Dick was laid in his last resting-place.

It was nearly twenty years before that he and I have met for the first time. The meeting took place in Mike Dunn's Home for ex-convicts in East Houston street, New York. Mike was a remarkable character. He had served thirty-five years in prison. The last time he was liberated he turned to the head-keeper and said: "You can let my cell to someone else. I shall never be back again."

The keeper said: "I will hold it for six weeks; after that you will want it again."

But the keeper was wrong. Mike never returned. He opened a home for ex-convicts, where they could come to earn a living and show the world they were trying to be honest. It was here that I met Slippery Dick, confidence man and thief. He was a small, well-built man, who spoke with a marked German accent, and his voice gave evidence of such culture and refinement that from the first he won my interest. To me he related his career, out of which thirty-six years had been spent in prison. With all this he said he was done. His old instincts, however, proved too strong. Three years later I saw him at the Cremorne Mission, and I arranged with the superintendent for his special care. Again he went back to his old life, and four years more had gone by before Slippery Dick and I met again.

One night he came into the Water Street Mission, a tramp and half-starved. I helped him, and he professed conversion; but he continued so untruthful and so dishonest that we could do but little for him. Last January, however, he came into the Mission, and went up to our "mercy seat" for prayers, for the last time.

"I ain't goin' to try to be a Christian any more," he said. "I am goin', with the help of God, to be one. In spite of everything, I will begin again."

It is easy enough to slip down hill; quite another thing to slip up. Dick's first step was dramatic. He goes to the restaurant, and sees there Mr. Hudson.

"If you do not give me work," he says, "I shall rob you."

Work is given to him. The ex-criminal becomes a washer of dishes; what is more, he washes the dishes well. In the restaurant is a cashier reputed to be honest. He steals the funds and disappears. The man who was once supposed to be honest is a thief; it occurs to the proprietor that the man who was once a thief is now honest. He appoints Slippery Dick cashier. No better cashier could be found.

But the effects of a life of hardship and exposure begin to tell. Dick was attacked by pneumonia, compelled to go to the hospital, and before many days have passed, poor Dick slipped peacefully away from us into the arms of his Saviour.

A Bible from the Sea's Bottom

NGANDA, S. M. S. CONGO, July 2, 1902. DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, Dear Sir:—I have the pleasure of telling you, with gratitude, that both the Red Letter Bible and the other beautiful premium have reached our station in very good condition. The pictures came with the wrecked Stanleyville, and have been with the other mail in the sea, yet they were very well kept. It was quite a cheering up to me, here in the wilderness.

It is a pleasure to me to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to my fellow-workers here, as I myself enjoy reading it very much. The illustrations make good lecture subjects on other peoples, countries and animals to our boys and girls at the station. ANNA BAUR.

D. L. Moody's Presentation Bible

In the chapel of Stone Hall, Northfield Seminary, is a large Bible, which was presented to the late Mr. D. L. Moody by the British and Foreign Bible Society. It has the following inscription, signed by the late Earl of Shaftesbury:

"Presented to Mr. D. L. Moody by the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society, as a token of their sympathy with his faithful and unwearied labors in making known the precious truths of the Holy Scriptures, and in seeking to win souls to Christ. John 12: 26.

We Want to Send You a Pair of Magic Foot Drafts for Rheumatism on Approval.

Send us a dollar if they give you comfort. Otherwise nothing. Take no medicine.

Magic Foot Drafts have drawn out and absorbed more poisonous acids where they could be burned or otherwise destroyed than all the medicine made could possibly drive out. The large pores of the feet are natural outlets. The nerves and blood vessels are most susceptible there. Magic Foot Drafts are the common sense remedy for rheumatism. Results prove it, for our record of reliefs is about nine out of ten cases. The chances are nine to one that they will relieve you, and we bear all the expense of trying thousands of sufferers every week—a policy which is making an enormous success of our business, because the drafts do relieve.

Don't suffer when comfort costs so little. Remember, you pay nothing until you are satisfied with the relief given—and you are the judge. Send your name to-day to the Magic Foot Draft Co., 824 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich.

THE JORDAN MIRACLE

Divine Guidance Assured in the Crises of Life

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Hebrews standing on the banks of the Jordan were in quite other circumstances than were their fathers when they encamped by the Red Sea, and Pharaoh's host was almost upon their heels. The enemies of Israel now were all before them in the land, and all enemies in their rear were conquered. This is the true position of the Lord's overcomers. Any unconfessed sin, anything wrong in the past which has not been set right, makes it impossible to go really forward into the possession of what God has promised us in Christ Jesus.

After three days the officers went through the midst of the camp, and they commanded the people, saying, "When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests, the Levites, bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it." Never precede the ark; never let any pressure drive thee to take a step where the certain presence of the Lord is not with thee. This is a rule for every true child of God. This cuts at the root of human policy, and this makes hesitation, mistake, and regret equally impossible. The priests, the Levites, who bear the ark, must also precede the people. When they go, who live in constant communion with God, then it is safe for others to go. Those who do not really know God, think that if they do as most people do, they will be all right, taking for granted that the majority are on the right side. Alas! it is not so. Our Lord says of "the strait gate," "Few there be that find it" (Matt. 7:14).

"Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits; come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore." If the ark had been carried by the Levites at the head of the great procession, only those immediately in the front would have seen it; but by the space between, the whole company could see the ark, with the pillar of cloud pioneering them. How much we need in our lives this space between! We need it for holy reverence, we need it for consideration to take in the mind of God about our way. "For ye have not passed this way heretofore." This may be and ought to be; indeed, it is the experience of all who really follow on to know the Lord. "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21:5) is true of every new creature in Christ Jesus, even now. One more thing was necessary. Joshua said unto the people, "Sanctify yourselves, for tomorrow the Lord will do wonders among you" (Josh. 3:1-5). Unprepared people—people who do not set themselves apart to God and for him—do not see God's wonders. How many of God's wonders are withheld because of a profane spirit among his people!

And now Joshua gives the word of command to the priests: "Take up the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and pass over before the people." Israel was to have been a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6), and this they will be in the Millennium (Isa. 60:6); but meanwhile the true Church of Christ is a royal priesthood (1 Pet. 2:9). The people could only go where the priests led them; every true child of God is a pioneer—it cannot be otherwise. "None of us liveth to himself" (Rom. 14:7). He who lives to himself has not the distinguishing mark of a follower of Christ. "And they took up the ark of the covenant, and went before the people." Israel was on the move, and now God could magnify Joshua in the sight of Israel. It is when we, too, are on the move, going forth to meet the Bridegroom, that the coming of our Lord is hastened, and the time of his glory, when he will be magnified.

Then the command was given to the priests that when they should come to the Jordan they should stand still in Jordan. There was wondrous quietude about this whole march—no hurry, no excitement, like the going out of Egypt. There could be no standing still in the Red Sea; the people then fled from before visible enemies. Now they are led forth by a God whose glory is visible to them, against enemies which he has doomed beforehand, and the people can go forward in rest and in assurance. God does not repeat himself; there is always something new in his deliverances. At the Red Sea the waters were driven back before any of the people set foot in the bed of the river; but at the Jordan the priests must exercise faith in the word of God, and actually set their feet in the waters of the overflowing river, before God would do anything. And God kept his word. No sooner were the feet of the priests resting in the waters of the river than they saw the water going down, down, down, till none was left, and no water came down from above.

Before the people passed over, the bed of the river was dry ground, and the inhabitants of the land had to see that their fears were justified, when they saw the heaped-up waters and the people of Israel pouring into Canaan. What a moment for them! And when the whole people had passed over, God ordained that a special memorial should be raised in memory of this miracle.

Not fewer than fifty thousand men live on board these vessels—many of the ships having crews of from 200 to 700 men. It is here that the training ships, crowded with lads and young men, end their cruises; it is here that the naval squadrons generally assemble before starting out on their missions of peace or war. Here, too, are the famous oyster and fishing beds, which give employment to thousands of men whose picturesque boats hover like a flock of birds over the water. Every language is spoken, every race represented among the mariners, and to reach them all is the aim of the Harbor Mission.

During the first month of the mission's existence, February, 1902, the little launch steamed over 173 miles; boarded 112 vessels, and distributed the Word of God and reading matter to the crews; forty-five other vessels were supplied without going on board—in all 157 vessels, all but six of which were American. There were 1,870 men on these ships, who accepted 523 copies of portions of the Bible; 769 tracts and religious papers, and 948 magazines and other reading matter were distributed. Services were held on the U. S. battleship Illinois, the U. S. revenue cutter Onondaga, and the U. S. collier Hannibal. In this manner, from month to month, the work goes on. In a later month, the little launch ran over to Yorktown and held services on the Olympia (Dewey's flagship), and on the San Francisco, both of which ships have no chaplain, and gave the missionaries a right hearty welcome.

This mission is supported by voluntary gifts. No collections are taken and no personal appeals made for funds. It costs a little over $200 a month to maintain the work. This includes the support of the chaplain and his assistant, supplies for the launch and running expenses. Any inquiries concerning the work can be addressed to the Chaplain, Rev. Robert E. Steele, P. O. Box 130, Hampton, Va.

DON'T BE MISLED and buy a heater from anyone before first finding out the weight and height. Pictures of Oak Heaters look very much alike but the weight and height indicate the true value. This is important, for weight denotes the quality of a stove and height adds to its attractiveness, therefore it is to your interest to get the heaviest and highest heater for your money that you can.

WE GUARANTEE all made and finished like the illustration, with fire-resisting castings of special mixed pig iron, solid one-piece, air-tight snuk bottom ash pit, large ash pan, ash pit door, air tight screw draft, heavy corrugated cast iron fire-pot, large handsome fire pot ring cemented and bolted to top and fire-pot stretched over cast flanges making the drum air tight, mounted with 18 gauge smooth steel and heavy never-wear-out castings, fitted with nickel swing top ring, nickel door latch, hinge pins and knobs, 3 nickel foot rails, nickel register in ash-pit door, nickel name plate and handsome spun brass urn. Important features are cooking lids under swing top, check damper in pipe collar and feed door, and shake and draw center grate for coal and wood.

OUR "FAULTLESS" HEATER AT $9.30 we recommend for all around use, because experience has taught us that it is the ideal size for a heating stove. It weighs 210 pounds, is 53 inches high, has a 16-inch fire pot, occupies 23 1/2 x 22 1/2 inches floor space, and takes 6-inch pipe. PRICES ARE FOR THE HEATERS FINELY BLACKED AND POLISHED ON BOARD CARS IN CHICAGO.

CHURCH MONEY

ONES EASY for Young People's Societies, Sunday Schools or Classes by Using Our Beautiful Souvenir Glass PAPER WEIGHTS.

Mail us a photograph of your church and pastor (Cabinet size preferred. Either together or separately). We will reproduce them together in one gross (144) solid glass paper weights, similar to accompanying cut, which is greatly reduced in size, actual size 4 inches long, 2 1/2 inches wide and 1 inch thick. These beautiful weights will readily sell at sight for twenty-five cents each to church members and business men in your locality, many of whom will buy several, as they make a useful souvenir, and are an ornament on any desk. We charge you 12 1/2 cents each in gross lots, or make $18.00 on each gross. We guarantee freight will not exceed $1 to any point west of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio River. You are at no risk, as we give you twenty days' time to examine and sell them, enabling you to dispose of most of them before remitting to us. Send us your order at once, enclosing photograph of your church and pastor, giving us the names and full directions for shipping, and be the first to take up this plan in your vicinity. Write us for a booklet and for further particulars if desired. Address

GREATEST HOUSEHOLD NECESSITY FREE

The "1900" Ball-Bearing family Washing Machine is absolutely indispensable in every home because it makes washday a pleasant, instead of a dreaded duty

WITHOUT ADVANCE PAYMENT OR DEPOSIT OF ANY KIND, FREIGHT PAID, ON 30 DAYS' TRIAL. MAY BE RETURNED FREE OF EXPENSE IF NOT SATISFACTORY.

THE "1900" WASHER will wash collars and cuffs, laces, cambrics, and the most delicate materials perfectly clean and positively without tearing them or wearing out a single thread. It will wash blankets, bed spreads and the heaviest clothes just as easily and thoroughly.

The "1900" Washer will wash collars and cuffs, laces, cambrics, and the most delicate materials perfectly clean and positively without tearing them or wearing out a single thread. It will wash blankets, bed spreads and the heaviest clothes just as easily and thoroughly.

The "1900" Ball-bearing Automatic Washing Machine is the simplest, easiest running, most efficient machine for washing clothes ever invented. It is a thoroughly practical labor-saving machine for washing all kinds and grades of materials, from the finest lace to the coarsest fabrics. It is constructed on scientific principles. It revolves on ball-bearings, which render the rotary movement as easy as the wheels of a high-grade bicycle. The "1900" Washer will wash any garment without boiling, without scrubbing and without wear or tear. There is absolutely no need of using any chemicals. Soap and water are the only necessary things to do perfect work.

HOW IT OPERATES

The operator turns it to the right and to the left about half way around each time. To make it work as nearly automatic as possible it is provided with two oil-tempered coiled springs at the bottom of the tub, which engage at each extreme point and help to reverse the motion. The machine moves uninterruptedly until it reaches the point where it should be reversed; then it comes in contact with the force of these springs and, like the action of a rubber ball, bounds back, meeting the spring force again at the other extremity.

As it Appears Looking Under the Bottom of the Tub.

The Washing is Done While the Operator Sits by the Side of the Tub, Revolving it by the Handle

There is no further need for stooping, rubbing by hand or boiling of clothes. The "1900" Washer will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how much they are soiled) in from 6 to 10 minutes.

It is not a cumbrous affair, for, unlike so many so-called washing machines, it has no complicated machinery, no wheels, paddles, rockers, cranks, etc.; in fact, it is so simple that a child can operate it. Other washers leave the wristbands, collars, and the most soiled places unfinished, but the "1900" Washer forces the water through ever fibre and washes every part thoroughly clean.

Other machines move the clothes through the water, but this machine forces the water through the clothes, and rubs them at the same time. The principle upon which this machine operates is directly opposite to that of any other.

The clothes are placed in the tub and the agitator, shown in the cut, which we call the washboard-side down. This agitator does not turn, but adjusts itself automatically up and down, regulated by the amount of clothes and water in the tub. Over this a cover is placed to prevent steam from escaping.

We assert in the most positive terms that any one who gives the "1900" Washer a fair trial will never use the washboard any more or if any other washer is in use, it will be given up at once. Hundreds of pleased customers will bear us out in this statement. Our offer of sending the washer on free trial, freight paid both ways, is a thoroughly honest and sincere one and proves beyond question our faith in its merits. No one ever returned a "1900" Washer, that needed one and gave it a fair trial, and no one would part with it for many times its cost, if they could not get another.

Inside View of Tub and Bottom of Agitator or Washboard.

REMEMBER,

you take absolutely no risk, incur no expense or obligation whatever. The washer is sent by us on 30 days' trial, freight prepaid going and coming, and positively without any advance payment or deposit of any kind.

ABSOLUTE PROOF FROM USERS OF THE "1900" WASHER

$1000.00 Will Be Paid to Any One Who Can Prove That Any of the Following Letters Are Not Genuine:

VERNA P. O., Virginia, March 4, 1902.

GENTLEMEN—The "1900" Washer I ordered of you about a year ago has given perfect satisfaction in every respect. It is the best, cleanest and easiest washer that I have ever seen. Clothes need no hand rubbing whatever, as the machine cleans them better than by hand, and the machine full of clothes, according to directions, will clean them thoroughly and rinse them in from fifteen to twenty minutes. All that is necessary is to have the water ready and the machine properly used does the rest. It is undoubtedly the best washing machine on the market.

GEORGE M. COUNCILL, Postmaster.

BUTLER, N. J., Oct. 22, 1901.

Please find Money-Order in full payment for Washing Machine. The washer is the best and easiest ever made. I never saw its equal in any Washer. One of my sons, who is an engineer, gets his over-clothes very dirty. They have been washed by your "1900" Washer just as clean as when they were new. It washes everything perfectly clean. It washes everything perfectly clean. It runs so easy that my little granddaughter did the first two tubs full. It is a marvel and I would not part with it for $100. In two months it will pay for itself.

Respectfully, MRS. MARTHA WITTY.

GOLDEN HILLS, ILLS., May 6, 1902.

Please find enclosed remittance for your washer. I cannot praise it too high. I don't see how I have done without it before. No more backache. It is a Godsend to weak women. Please accept my heartfelt thanks to you, for it is the first free trial I ever sent for that was indeed free.

Respectfully yours, MRS. CARRIE STAFFORD.

KANSAS CITY, MO., May 14, 1902.

I have given your washer a fair trial. It is the best washer I ever saw. It has washed our heavy blankets with perfect ease. I washed them last spring and rubbed more than an hour and yet they had to go through again, but the "1900" Washer cleaned them thoroughly clean. We do our washing so quick and have no tired and worn out feeling as of old. I wish every lady had a washer.

Respectfully yours, MRS. J. L. BANNER, 4203 Troost Ave.

CUMBERLAND, MD., May 19, 1902.

Have tried the machine again and must say we are much pleased with it and have found it to give the best satisfaction of any we ever tried. I think we had 4 or 5 different kinds, but find yours the best of them all.

Respectfully yours, MRS. J. A. POPP.

Answers to Question of the Week

A Rented House is not "Home"

That man is foolish who, having the necessary funds to purchase a home, prefers to rent. The wise outlay of hard earned money is a good investment, and how could it be better invested than in a permanent home, where the family come together daily after the stress and storm of life as to a refuge. A rented house does not mean the same to a family. The feeling is there that it is not their own, and nothing matters much what is done it.

MARY DREW.

Peculiar Advantages of Owning a Home
It is wiser to buy. The possession of a home, however humble, gives one a sense of permanency, of vested rights, of community responsibility and interests; awakens public spirit and patriotism, and arouses emulation. It is a foundation on which to build, a point from which to advance. Every flower, shrub, fruit tree, every improvement without and within, enhances the value of the home and endears it to the heart and memory, because marking the steps in the prosperity and life of the family. Time and money, that would otherwise be frittered on transient pleasures, will be spent in beautifying the home; and habits of self control, self respect, economy, and thrift will be cultivated. L. G. P.

No Place Like Your Own Home

To be the owners of their own home will at once give a young couple a social standing not usually accorded to those who rent. It will also foster a spirit of industry, and even though it should require years of stringent economy to pay for a home, the genuine satisfaction derived through ownership, and the strength of character gained, are not to be measured by the sacrifices involved. Then, too, the ownership of a home is an incentive to improve and care for it and its surroundings, which is seldom found among renters, and as this interest will probably be jointly shared, it will result in cementing more closely together the lives of husband and wife. So I say to the young married couple, buy your home; and the years as they roll around, with their joys and their sorrows, their failures and triumphs, will make it the best spot tion—you own it, and you have got to begin all over again. Suppose, on the other hand, you buy a lot somewhere (not in a large city), paying for it, say $250. You want a house like that for which you paid $20 per month rent. (It is a fair valuation to estimate such properties as worth 10 years' rental). You borrow from a building loan company $2,000 at 5 per cent. and pay a fair average bonus, of say 20 cents per $100. This would be the showing: Dues per month $8, interest $8, bonus $4, equals $20 per month, in 10 years, $2,400. It would, however, take about 12 years to run out—or say a total in payments of $2,880 for your $2,000 house. You have thus bought your house outright by paying $20 monthly for 12 years and have paid $880 for the accommodation. How does this compare with paying out $2,400 in 10 years for nothing? This is not an exaggerated statement by any means. Of course, you have to pay taxes and insurance besides. A. H.

Five Reasons why they Should Buy

It is wiser for a young married couple to buy their own home than to rent. Even the installment plan, which is the most expensive, penurious and narrow-minded, the strongest reason against stringent economy is that it may entail disease on the parents and children, if any, by the denial of comforts, clothes and wholesome food. FAY E. McMILLAN.

Rent, and Save Your Money

By all means rent. Young married couple should begin life with a horror of debt. The most prolific source of matrimonial infelicity is financial disagreement. To own a home is a worthy ambition, and every young married couple should look toward the accomplishment of this end. By careful economy, sum can be laid aside each year toward the building of the home nest. The little savings can be carefully invested, and, in time, the home procured. Its possession will be much sweeter because the awful millstone—debt—has not harassed the young lives.

EUDORA B. VAN VALZAH.

Would Involve Years of Self-Denial

With my experience, I would advise, under ordinary circumstances, to rent. If one could pay cash for a home at the start, well and good. Otherwise, it would mean, to people of ambition, years of self-denial of the needful things of life. One can have all of the modern improvements nowadays with a little or no more expense than would be required by the month or quarter on one's own property. Also the landlord is responsible for any repairing which may be needed, relieving one of all care in that line. On family I have in mind as buying a home for themselves on advertised "easy terms." They save hired labor, they did nearly all of the work on the place themselves, which, with late hours, made them an easy prey to disease. They both sickened and died in the same month. READER.

Miscellaneous Questions

NO MORE WORLD WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIAS.—Please take notice that the slightly damaged sets of the World Wide Encyclopedia, offered at a reduced price in our issue of Sept. 10, have all been disposed of. The demand greatly exceeded the supply, and a large amount of money had to be returned on orders received too late to be filled.

R. L. D., Macon, Ga. Who wrote "A drop of ink makes millions think"?

You refer doubtless to these lines by Byron: But words are things, and a small drop of ink, falling like dew upon a thought produces [think] That which makes thousands, perhaps millions.

R. B., Baltimore, Md. Everybody is asking: "What are we going to do this winter for coal?"

At present the outlook is gloomy enough especially for the poor. Let us hope, however, that the strike will soon be over, and that coal will return to normal prices.

A correspondent at Ballard, Cal., sends us a programme of a dance "by the Threshers' Crew," to be given for the benefit of a certain clergyman of the place. While we do not know the circumstances, it hardly seems to us likely that the preacher could have approved of such a method of raising money.

M. E. S., Bridgeport, Conn. I have been unable, until Sunday last, to get the names I intended to send you. May I send them now, as I should very much like to get one of those beautiful Drop Calendars?

Yes, if you send the names AT ONCE we will accept them, and will send you the Calendar.

on earth, hallowed by tender association, and endeared by recollection, so that you will find a sacred meaning in the lines so familiar to us all:

Be it ever so humble,
There's no place like home.
ERNEST SMEDLEY.

The Figures of the Question

Aside altogether from the thousand-and-one practical advantages of owning your own home—the sense of comfort, of security, of social status in your community, of homelikeness in your surroundings—which can hardly be realized even by the most fortunate "renter," since he is only a tenant-at-will, and, like the migratory Arabs, must pitch his tent and pack up at a landlord's whim—there is a convincing financial side to the argument in favor of house-ownership. Let us suppose you are a "renter." You pay:

$12 per month for 10 years, or $1,440—but you own it.
$15 per month for 10 years, or $1,800—you own it.
$20 per month for 10 years, or $2,400—you own it.
$25 per month for 10 years, or $3,000—you own it.
$30 per month for 10 years, or $3,600—you own it.

At the end of it all—no matter what rent you pay—you are precisely in the same position—must be recommended to those unable to purchase in any other way. 1. The establishment of an abiding home tends to steady the habits; 2. Interest in personal property tends to produce thrift and tidiness; 3. Determination to pay for the home, tends to make the payment of all obligations appear as a duty, so that debts come to be avoided; 4. The home becomes to children a fixed and definite place of associations, which are never had in tenement life; 5. The home, being the highest ideal that points to the "House not built with hands," helps lift men's thoughts to God and heaven.

CLAUDE M. SEVERANCE.

Pinching Robs Life of its Sweetness

All things being equal, it is wiser to rent than buy a home, if it involves years of stringent economy. In youth, the material comforts of life are more enjoyed than in old age. If stringent economy is practised, the young people will be deprived of many innocent social pleasures, which have a tendency to broaden their lives and to better prepare them for the trials, which in the natural course of things attend old age. If they practice too rigid economy their intellectual faculties will be in a sense denied development. The spiritual welfare, too, will be retarded. They will become people of one idea and lose sight of their duty, with a morbid grasping for money, which is contemptible. Besides making them

In "the Land of the Sky"

LAUREL POINT, PERRY CO., KY.
Thursday, Sept. 11, 1902.

Nowhere could you see a finer or more characteristic meeting of men, women and children, than the last assembly in the church at Crockettville. I think the first assembling of the Pilgrims at Plymouth for public worship, after their landing, was like it, only we had here more children, with their sweet voices. Miss Anne played the little organ in leadership.

Dr. Guerrant, by apt illustrations drawn from the country roundabout, contrasted the life of the saved with that of the lost, and called every man to the higher planes of privilege. How could a human heart resist such appeals? Gen. Howard gave incidents in his knowledge of the extraordinary fulfilments exhibited by some grand men, soldiers and others, even before they gerous in the extreme to wheeled vehicles. In anything in the shape of a ravine, in the midst of what seemed an interminable forest, are inhabitants' homes, such as they are, generally of logs, seldom nearer to each other than a quarter of a mile. Peter McIntosh has his house at the summit, with part of his place in Breathitt County and part in Perry County. His family gave us an unusually hearty welcome. Here was exhibited that wisdom which furnishes a missionary with the skill not only to bring healing of the soul, but also that of the body. Dr. Guerrant was a physician before he became a clergyman. In this house, at the crest of a mountain range, he cured a child that would have perished of pneumonia. This was a year ago, and it was the wedge of entrance. That family will always appreciate his work and his teaching. There are many instances of the kind where he has given quick relief, and he is doing it now every day.

AT "SQUABBLE CREEK"

When we had descended the steep grade for perhaps two miles or more, we fell upon a better country. It was the opening out of rolling plateaus, and some level out on our right and left, among the never-ending forest trees, and corn-fields crept up to the top of every available ascent. In the midst of a grove, higher up, and mostly covered by evergreens, was a pretty little church, which Dr. Guerrant pointed to with pride. We had hardly passed along the trail at the bottom of its winding pathway, when we heard the cheerful sound of a church bell, clear-toned enough to be heard for miles around.

A QUEER PROCESSION

We had not gone far before we met a procession of people of all descriptions, on foot and on horseback, two, and sometimes three on a horse; so we turned back, and wound our way around and up, somewhat after the fashion of Dante's spiral ascent, till we touched the crest back of the church. There we found a scattered burying ground, not fenced in. Some of the graves were prettily decorated with white shells, giving names or simple memorials of the departed. It seemed almost like sacrilege to hitch our horses so near the graves, but the plateau was not large enough to avoid it.

The view from the front of the church takes in an unusual expanse for this country; including a part of the had passed "beyond the river."

We had a remarkable sunset, and the mountains were seen at their best. Hundreds of trees stood out in the bright light, in different colors of gray, red, yellow and deep green. They suggested people who dwell in the light, as God is in the light, with a beauty and a glory that cannot be described.

The next day (Wednesday, Sept. 10) our little party began climbing to the tip-top of a mountain range, going by a trail practicable enough for saddle horses, but dan-spots, as we descended "Squabble Creek." Some ancient fight of Indians against the new settlers is said to be the foundation of this euphonic name; but if we may believe the traditions of the last twenty years, we can realize that there have been other squabbles, than those of Indians, in Perry County. Commodore Perry's name is still fresh in the recollection of the old people; and I was glad to have known his worthy son and grandsons in the army.

As we progressed, larger if not better houses peeped river (the Middle Fork of the Kentucky), where you see evidences of cultivation fighting hard against the forest wilderness of the everlasting hills. You ask: "What do the people do for a living?" My answer is: The main dependence is corn, cultivated with great labor—the labor of everybody able to work, from child, to woman and man. This is supplemented by fuel, ad libitum, and by short logs, two feet through, made up in neat rafts, sometimes a hundred or more logs in a raft, which waits for the winter and spring rains to be floated to the main river, and on to mill and market. The sycamore, poplar, chestnut, and the oak, with some other trees furnish abundant timber. Near this place, Laurel Point, where there is a store, is a good saw mill; there, near at hand, are logs in plenty, and also piles and piles of railway ties. You see strong wagons hauled by oxen, drawing the logs to mill, or to landings where the rafts are made, and ties are waiting in convenient places for transportation by flat boats, to distant railway stations. Here and there, sorghum and tobacco crops supplement other things. Hogs, sheep, cattle, horses, and fowls galore, make the people richer than they dream.

THE BEST "POOR MAN'S COUNTRY"

Berry Turner says that this is the best poor man's country in the world. You seldom find a village, but settlements, with homes not in sight of each other, scattered along the river, the forks, the creeks and the branches of creeks—most of which you would call canyons and ravines—long and short, great and small.

One thing that strikes the observer in this country is the abundance of fine children, hearty and strong. A namesake of mine has twenty-one sons, besides many daughters. I thought it was an exaggeration, but one of the best teachers of the mountains, Green Sheppard, told me that he knew every one of them by name, for he had been brought up near them.

I saw yesterday a young man of eighteen, who had married a few months ago, a beautiful girl of fifteen. She was bright and happy, but I could not help feeling sorry that her girlhood was so cut short by marriage. Seeing my astonishment, my host cried out:

"Why, my neighbor, So-and-so married his wife when she was twelve years old! She has had thirteen sons, one of whom died, and four daughters. She has now sixteen children and is still a young woman."

Remember, that the average household in this part of photographer, Mr. Stark, ranged himself and his instrument on the side hill, and took in the moving group of worshipers, church and all, not excluding the dogs and horses. At three in the afternoon we were all there again, after a charming entertainment at Mr. Gross'. The little multitude had increased. We sang the songs of Zion; we poured out our hearts for blessing, and

Dr. Guerrant said at once: "All things work together for good, to them that love God." I never heard a stronger demonstration of that truth, shown by instance after instance of the changes that had been wrought through the Soul Winners, and through the multiplying influence of those home people who have come to Christ. Gen. Howard endeavored to show how some of the Christian problems are worked out by the help of God's spirit, accompanied by prayer and self-sacrifice, showing that when he himself had been weak, he had, by God's help, been strong. He told how various Indian tribes and cruel white men, had been brought into unison during one of his visits to Arizona. He himself, aided by Capt. Sladen and Capt. Jeffers, an interpreter and two Indian guides, had succeeded in making peace with the fiercest Indian tribe of Arizona, and in bringing Cochise (an Indian chief) and five hundred Indians out of their stronghold, and putting them upon a reservation, without the sacrifice of a human life.

The half is not told. The Father has put it into the heart of her whom the people call "Miss Louise," to have a college near that glorious little church, on the country contains from six to seven growing children.

Our service in the church began at ten, and the people came from their harvesting work, just now very important, and filled the house fairly well. The audience room, 45 x 25, is sufficiently high, and remarkably well ceiled and furnished. The people have generously built it themselves, with less than $200 help from the missionaries, through Miss Louise Saunders, the daughter of the venerable Dr. Saunders, whom I have already mentioned. In fact, she presented the subject directly to a Louisville church, which gave the most of the funds.

A REGION TRANSFORMED

I think that under the leadership of Dr. Guerrant and his co-workers, the whole country roundabout has been transformed. Our morning service was the most cheerful and happy of any I have participated in thus far. We seemed to have got to the top of the "mountain of privilege." A short time ago, it was a dark and almost hopeless field; now the church is planted, hearts are changed, and not only religion but education for the young is earnestly desired and prayed for. Again Dr. Guerrant showed what wonderful things had been done; so much, that every heart should rejoice: and he also indicated that much was yet to be done. Gen. Howard followed with some new illustrations, showing the wonderful love which God has for men everywhere, in parental affection.

As we were descending from this beautiful mountain towards the valley on this Wednesday, our

THE STARS OF AUTUMN

Their Present Position and Appearance in the October Sky

By GARRETT P. SERVISS

IN the crisp nights of October, the starry heavens appear to have exchanged the soft splendor of summer for a livelier radiance. The change is due partly to atmospheric causes, and partly to the character of the dominant constellations.

The northern half of the sky, at this season, appears most brilliant. At about 10 o'clock P.M. on the first of October, the time for which our chart is drawn, the northern hemisphere (marked on the chart by the crossing of the equator and the ecliptic), is about an hour and a half east of the meridian, the only conspicuous star in the south is the lone Fomalhaut, in the mouth of Piscis Austrinus, the Southern Fish.

The poverty of the surrounding region in bright stars makes Fomalhaut a very attractive object to the eye of the casual observer of the heavens. And, being not very high above the horizon, it is affected by air currents to such a degree that it often flames with startling brilliance. Situated in more populous parts of the sky, Fomalhaut would not attract much attention. It is an example of the value of an effective setting. Mere talent may seem genius in the midst of mediocrity. But, while the southern sky in autumn is relatively barren, in the north the eye is satisfied with a notable display of starry beauties. The Milky Way, rising like a silver spangled arch in the northeast, passes overhead just north of the zenith and then descends to the western horizon, fringed through nearly its whole extent with splendid constellations, such as Auriga, Perseus, Cassiopeia, Andromeda, Cepheus, the Northern Cross (Cygnus), Lyra, and Aquila.

But it will be best for us, in our survey of the sky, with the aid of our chart, to start with the southern part. As I have said, the chart represents approximately the appearance of the sky at 10 P.M., on the first of October. But it answers for other dates as well: For instance, 10.30 P.M., on Sept. 23, the date of the autumnal equinox, when the sun crosses the line, 9 P.M., in the middle of October, and 8 P.M., on the first of November. Let us return to the Fomalhaut, the bright star in the south. West of Fomalhaut we notice the constellation Capricornus, which extends on both sides of the ecliptic, and nearly in the centre of this constellation glows an orb, so bright that the most brilliant stars seem insignificant in comparison with it. It is the planet Jupiter. Its overpowering splendor, and the steadiness of its golden yellow light, alone suffice to make it recognizable, even to a tyro in astronomy. Although not so favorably situated as it was in August and September, yet there is almost endless pleasure still in store for him who studies Jupiter and his attendant satellites, in the clear nights of autumn, with a good telescope of three, four or five inches aperture. About twenty degrees west of Jupiter, and too near the horizon to be studied with advantage, appears the planet Saturn, in the constellation Sagittarius, which borders on Capricornus. Saturn is far less brilliant than Jupiter, yet it shines as bright as a first magnitude star, without the splintered and twinkling rays that characterize the fixed stars.

Returning to the meridian, we glance up as high as the equator, and perceive a fairly conspicuous group of stars in the constellation Aquarius. This constellation adjoins Capricornus on the east, and spreads widely across the sky toward the left, without any very notable stars, until in the southeast it meets the still larger constellation of Cetus, the Whale, one of whose stars, Mira, far over near the eastern horizon, is a wonderful variable. But it is not well situated for observation at this season.

We next glance overhead, when our attention is at once attracted by a large, almost regular, square, with a star on each corner, which indicates the constellation Pegasus. Sloping off toward the northeast, from one corner of the great Square, is a row of bright stars marking the famous Andromeda, the chained maiden of mythology, who was fastened to a rock at the seashore to be devoured by a sea-monster, but who was rescued by the hero Perseus, the favorite of the gods, who fitted him out with a diamond-hilted sword, which nothing could withstand, and a pair of winged sandals, which enabled him to navigate the air with the speed of the wind.

The northeastern star in the Square really belongs to Andromeda, and not to Pegasus, and it marks her head. The next bright star in the row toward the northeast is in her girdle, at one end of which glows the great Andromeda Nebula. The third star in the row marks the position of her feet.

Still lower in the northeast, immersed in the gleaming current of the Milky Way, we find Perseus, the rescuer of Andromeda. The brightest star of this constellation is in the middle of a short row of stars bent like a bow. South of this row, in a little group of faint stars, is situated Algol, the demon star, which runs through a marvelous succession of changes, at first rapidly losing its light until it is comparable only with the little stars near it, and then gaining brilliance again until it nearly equals the large star in the row of Perseus. These periodic changes occupy only a few hours, and their corresponding phases occur at intervals of two days, twenty hours and forty-nine minutes. Algol will be at its faintest on October 27, at about 10.30 P. M., Eastern standard time. By noting the exact hour of its minimum, and then adding the interval of two days, etc., above given, the future minima can be predicted at will.

Following the Milky Way down toward the horizon, the constellation Auriga is found below Perseus in the northeast. Its greatest star is Capella, a splendid white brilliant of the first magnitude, easily the rival in brightness of Vega, which we shall notice presently. The second magnitude star, immediately east of, or below, Capella, is Beta Auriga, one of the wonderful "spectroscopic binaries," of which several have been discovered in the past ten years. These are stars appearing single in the telescope, but really composed of two circling around one another.

To the right of Auriga we perceive Taurus, with the conspicuous V-shaped figure of the Hyades, and the sparkling little group of the Pleiades, rapidly rising.

Above the Pleiades again, and adjoining Perseus on the south, is the constellation Aries, the first in the order of the Zodiac. The stars Alpha and Beta, in Aries, make a fairly conspicuous pair, Beta having a fainter star named Gamma near it. Above Aries again, and stretching a long, crooked row of not very bright stars between Cetus and the great Square of Pegasus, is the constellation Pisces, the last in the order of the Zodiac. We now return to Andromeda. Between this constellation and the North Pole Star, where the current of the Milky Way flows very rich and bright, is Cassiopeia, who, according to the old legend, was the royal mother of Andromeda. The five stars marking the chair in which the old-fashioned pictures of the constellations represented Queen Cassiopeia as sitting, are easily recognized, for they form a conspicuous zigzag row, unlike any other figure in the sky. West of Cassiopeia, and under the meridian, stands the King Cepheus, father of Andromeda. We next consider the northwestern quarter. Far down near the horizon we recognize the Great Bear, Ursa Major, by means of the Dipper, whose bowl is upright, with the handle stretched along the horizon toward the left. Winding between Ursa Major and the "Little Dipper" of Ursa Minor appears the long constellation of Draco, the head of the great dragon of the north, being marked by a conspicuous diamond of stars high up in the northwest.

Yet higher than the head of Draco is the beautiful little constellation Lyra, adorned by one of the chief ornaments of the sky, the blue-white star Vega. Under Lyra is the constellation Hercules, and close to the northwestern horizon, is the circlet of the Northern Crown. Above Lyra, west of the zenith, appears the Northern Cross, the best marked portion of the constellation Cygnus. Below the cross, toward the south and southwest, we see the constellations of Delphinus, sometimes called "Job's coffin," and Aquila, the latter having a rather small first magnitude star, Altair, with a smaller star like a sentinel on either side. From Aquila downward to the western horizon the Milky Way is a wondrous cloud of silvery light, gathered here and there into knots of sparkling beauty, where the telescope shows thousands upon thousands of stars heaped together in twinkling masses. On a clear night the eye is satiated with the richness of this starry display, and the mind is overwhelmed with the sense of countlessness and endlessness which sweeps over it. Here, indeed, the heavens declare the glory of God!

Great Opportunities

TEXT, Galatians 6: 10:

"As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men"

"Do circumstances make the man, or man the circumstances?" is the theme of a never-ending discussion. Some people are intense in their advocacy of the first-half of this question. They believe that no great temporal achievement is possible, unless that success is the outgrowth of a fortuitous combination of favorable circumstances. At the present time they point, by way of illustration, to the career of the President of the United States, and assert that the present incumbent would not have reached his exalted position had not the unseen Fates singled him out as one of their most favored children. It was a tidal wave of municipal reform, over which he had practically no control, that bore him, a comparatively unknown young man, into a police commissioner's chair of New York City. It was the result of the Spanish-American War, which he did nothing to bring about, that made him Governor of New York State. It was a conspiracy of the politicians to politically mummify and embalm his Presidential aspirations that shelved him, much against his will, in the vice-presidential chair. And then it was an assassin's bullet that opened for him almost immediately the front door of the White House. Thus the believers in the doctrine that "circumstances make men" declare that in four short years a startling series of events, unexampled in the history of our nation, changed a young assistant secretary of the Navy Department into the Executive head of the mightiest nation in the world. On the other hand, those who hold the opposite view, and answer in the negative the question, "Do circumstances make the man?" which has been debated in every college literary society of the land, contend that the President owes his elevation to his virile force, unimpeachable character, intense convictions and never yielding grit. They declare that no power on earth could ever have kept him an underling. They affirm that these characteristic qualities would have forced him to the front no matter in what clime he might have lived or to what flag he might have owed his allegiance. These two interpretations of such a well known career, to a greater or less extent may be applied to the worldly success of almost every man who has attained eminence in public affairs.

But though high temporal achievement can be reached only by a few, my text distinctly implies that great spiritual usefulness and great opportunities to serve mankind are attainable by every true Christian. Therefore, in this sermon I would analyze and discuss and emphasize the one Pauline word, "opportunity!"

Come to Alert People

Great opportunities are willing to knock at the door of only the honored few who have previously made great preparations to greet and to embrace them. They are not friendless and helpless waifs of the street. They are not social outcasts, who have to beg a place whereon to lay their heads. They are not fugitives from justice, who are fleeing the convict's cell or the hangman's noose. They are august messengers, who are particular under what roof they lodge and at what table they sit down and eat. Thus we find, by tracing history, that though all men who have prepared themselves for success in a certain line of work, do not necessarily get the opportunity to achieve that success, yet in no case do we find the swift-footed travelers called "Great Opportunities," dwelling in the home of one who has not the mental and moral capacity to welcome and entertain them.

Almost every great man of history has declared that the result of his life's work was not due to mere haphazard chance, but to years of work; years of preparation, and often years of inconspicuous toil. Read the autobiography of James Marion Sims, the surgeon whose discoveries have alleviated the sufferings of multitudes of the human race. He worked for years and years in his peculiar department of surgery, before the opportunity of fame and success came. He worked in obscurity and in poverty. He worked until his own health broke down, and he feared he must die. Read the testimony of Thomas A. Edison. Did the opportunity come and knock at his laboratory by mere haphazard chance? No! Thomas A. Edison distinctly and emphatically declares that he never made any great invention without first subjecting his brain to the hardest kind of mental toil. These are his very words: "I never did anything worth doing by accident, nor did any of my inventions come indirectly through accident, except the phonograph. When I have fully decided that a result is worth getting, I go ahead on it, and make trial after trial, until it comes." The opportunity for great success in any department of life never comes, except to him who has equipped himself by a rigid course of preparation, and inexorable training.

This premise being true, it is essential that the Christian should consecrate his life to Christ, in order to be prepared for the great opportunities of Christian service. It is very important for you and me to live close to Christ, to feel the touch of Christ's anointing hands upon our hearts, to feel the touch of his loving lips on our cheeks, the touch of his anointing foot upon our feet, before we can go forth successfully on our mission of Christian service. Many failures in the Christian life can be traced directly to this lack of spiritual preparation. Failing such preparation, we cannot recognize our opportunity when it comes. An ancient sculptor, once chiseled the statue of the mythological goddess, called "Opportunity," with a veiled face. He said: "The reason I covered Opportunity's face, was because so few are able to recognize her when she stands by their side." The sculptor was wrong in part, as well as right in part. He should have blinded the eyes of the onlooker, rather than the far-seeing eyes of the mythological goddess. The chief reason why some of us do not see the sweet-faced Pauline messengers, which we may call the Opportunities of Christian service, is because most of us are spiritually blinded by our past sins; because most of us are not willing, by prayer and earnest communion with God, to make the spiritual preparation that is necessary to fit us aright for Gospel work.

Self-Sacrifice Needed

But more than mere equipment is necessary. Great opportunities are willing to bless those only who are ready to sacrifice, and, if need be, to die for the cause those opportunities represent. There is a wide difference between being mentally, physically and spiritually equipped to meet a great opportunity, and being willing to make the sacrifice that is essential for the success of that cause, after the opportunity has arrived. Pilate was mentally and spiritually able to realize the nature of the opportunity of his position. He knew that Jesus was guiltless. He saw clearly and distinctly what he ought to do. But Pilate was not ready to sacrifice for Christ his political career as Governor of Judea. Therefore, Pilate, who saw his opportunity, embraced it not, but shrank from it. So there are many men who are mentally equipped for great opportunities of Christian service, who might also be spiritually equipped for those same opportunities, were they not unwilling to make the sacrifice which true consecration demands. They are unwilling to do for Christ that which they know they ought to do.

Christ's disciples to-day often shrink from making the same kind of sacrifice for Christian service which Richard Fuller made when a young man. At that time he was the most promising junior member of the South Carolina bar. He was the pride of his city, and the future hope of his State. But, being converted, he immediately turned his back on political preferment, renounced public life, and declared that he would consecrate his life thenceforth to the Gospel ministry. His friends tried to dissuade him. Hon. William E. Preston, Mr. Calhoun's colleague in the United States Senate, went to his home to plead with him. Then young Fuller turned and said, "Preston, I was living a selfish life, eager only to win success and have a great name among men. Religion never entered my thoughts, and I was negligent of all duty to God. Suddenly my eyes were opened. I discovered God's great love to me. I saw that Jesus Christ had left heaven, and come to earth, and died to win my love. This act has so impressed me that, as a man of honor, I can do nothing else but love him in return, and give my whole life to his service. Preston, does it seem to you that I am acting irrationally?" "No, Fuller," exclaimed Senator Preston, "you are right. You are the rational man, and we are the irrational; because most of us do not live up to our Christian opportunities. We do not do for Christ what we well know we ought to do." The grandest opportunities of Christian service demand the complete and voluntary surrender of our whole lives to Jesus Christ.

Morse's Changed Career

Great opportunities often come in unexpected places at unexpected times to those whom they wish to honor. General U. S. Grant began his "Memoirs of the Civil War" with these solemn words: "Man proposes, but God disposes." Man plans, but the Infinite is continually changing the plans of the finite. Man hopes, but God often builds an entirely different superstructure upon the foundations of those desires than that which we architecturally designed. Samuel F. B. Morse, the inventor of telegraphic communication, started life as an artist. He spent many years abroad in the study of the old masters. He was the founder and the first president of New York's "National Academy of Design." But in October, 1832, when he was forty-one years of age, and returning from his artistic studies in Europe, he entered into conversation one day with a fellow-passenger on board the packet ship Sully. This conversation, which was about the properties of the electro-magnet, led Samuel F. B. Morse then and there to consecrate the rest of his life to the establishment of electric communication between the distant parts of the world. So the opportunities for Christian usefulness may come in unexpected ways and at unexpected times.

Great opportunities for Christian usefulness may come to you as they came to Stephen Merritt during business hours, when, by the grace of God, he was instrumental in starting John G. Woolley out on his career of reform. They may come to you as they are daily coming, in unexpected ways, to thousands of lawyers, and merchants, and ministers, and doctors, and wives, and mothers, and servants, and clerks. Therefore, as our opportunities for doing Christian service are coming in so many different and unexpected ways, we should always be on the lookout for them. We should always be ready to grasp them, and to turn them to account at any cost, even of life itself.

Great opportunities always love company, and rarely travel alone. They are apt to be gregarious in their habits. Like troubles, they swim in schools. They travel in herds. They fly in flocks. Like the leader of a flock of sheep, each great opportunity seems to be the bell-wether of a whole flock of other opportunities. Like the key-log in a river jam, when the great opportunity is once let loose, it seems to be the precursor, and sets free a whole riverful of other opportunities.

John J. Ingalls tried to convey the idea that if we would only seize the one great opportunity of our life, that opportunity would lead us on from power to power, and from success to success. He tried to teach this lesson in his poem called "Opportunity." Let me read to you from its magnificent passages:

Master of human destinies am I!
Fame, love and fortune on my footsteps wait—
Cities and fields I walk! I penetrate Deserts and seas remote, and passing by Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake; if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate:
And they who follow me, reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate
Condemned to failure, penury and woe
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore,
I answer not, and I return no more!

As John J. Ingalls taught that the great opportunities of temporal success are the central magnets about which other great opportunities are apt to revolve, so every great spiritual opportunity, if rightly improved, will be the forerunner of others. God, from one opportunity of Christian usefulness, rightly served, will lead you on to another, to another and another.

Opportunities Missed

But there is a negative side of warning in my text, as well as a positive side of exhortation. John J. Ingalls, in his wonderful poem, teaches the same two lessons in a temporal sense, that Paul inculcates in a spiritual sense. The negative warning, which is implied in my text, goes practically like this: "As we therefore have opportunity, do good unto all men; for if you do not, a neglected opportunity is an illy used opportunity. And an opportunity for doing good once gone, is gone forever." My father used to love to picture lost opportunities as a flock of last year's migrating birds, which, when gone, can not be brought back. I remember well how he once stood in the Brooklyn Tabernacle, crying with a loud voice to the lost opportunities these words: "Come back, Oh ye past opportunities, come back! Come back." Then in an almost inaudible whisper, he said, "I hear no flutter of any wings. I fear my voice has not carried far enough, Yea, I fear these lost opportunities for doing good, will never, never come back." The old Romans used to believe that Opportunity was a messenger who had a lock of hair growing upon her forehead, and that the rest of her head was bald. They also believed she had wings upon her feet, and that she could fly swifter than the winds. They believed that if Opportunity was not grasped by the forehead, she could not be caught again, because her wings could outspeed even the flight of a meteor. The Latin symbol is a good one. It is better than that of the flight of migrating birds. Sometimes the migrating birds of last year do return, and nest again in the old orchards where they once raised their young; but great opportunities for doing good to others, once gone, are gone forever. Others may come, but never those that are past.

COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER CONSUL BOOTH-TUCKER
Leaders of the Army in the United States

WILLIAM BOOTH ON HIS ASH BARREL PULPIT, 1844

MISS EVA BOOTH MRS. CATHERINE BOOTH
Canadian Commissioner "Mother of the Salvation Army"

THE Salvation Army throughout America is rejoicing over the visit to this country of the veteran founder and leader of that great organization, General William Booth. This makes the fourth time the Army's Chief crosses the Atlantic to see his legions on this side, and his presence has always acted as a strong inspiration and encouragement to the followers of the Army standard here. Outside of Army circles, his coming is, too, an occasion of exceptional interest. Our civil, as well as our religious bodies, appreciate the good work which the Army has done; cordial greetings will be extended to its venerable head wherever he goes. The programme arranged for his reception and the inauguration of his "Mammoth New York Campaign," as given out some weeks ago by Commander Booth-Tucker, embraced a naval demonstration—a fleet of twelve steamers, crowded with Salvationists, going down the Bay to meet the General; a march and review in front of Army Headquarters on Fourteenth street; preaching by the General in the Academy of Music, Sunday, October 5, and a grand rally in Carnegie Music Hall, October 6, with Mayor Seth Low to preside, and make the address of welcome. The list of Vice-Presidents of the welcoming committee included Rev. Drs. S.P. Cadman, J. Wilbur Chapman, Newell Dwight Hillis, Josiah Strong, J.M. Farrar, Louis Klopsch; and Mr. Robert C. Ogden, Mr. Philip T. Dodge, Hon. Edward M. Grout, Mr. Van Rensselaer and other prominent pastors and citizens of Greater New York. The subject announced for the General's address was, "The Past, Present and Future of the Salvation Army."

Few pages in the world's religious and social history are more interesting, picturesque and dramatic than the organization and growth of this mighty army of peace, on whose "banner of blood and fire the sun never sets." In 1844, the Army had its humble beginning in talks delivered from an ash-barrel pulpit in the slums of Nottingham, England, by a young evangelist, who had not the faintest dream that his simple, earnest efforts to carry the word of God to people who would not go to God's House to hear it, would ever culminate in the organization of a great body of workers commissioned to teach and to help unchurched masses the world around. He was not an ordained minister, but just a devout Christian lad, who worked at his secular employment until eight every night, and then went forth "to an open-air meeting, a prayer-meeting, or the bedside of the sick and the dying." His mother was a widow and he her support. At the age of fifteen he had been converted in a Wesleyan chapel, and had immediately set about seeking lost souls. At seventeen, he was appointed a local preacher and urged to enter the ministry, but various obstacles prevented. Yet, on Sundays he tramped from village to village, preaching in church after church.

"TROOPING OF THE NATIONS," CARNEGIE HALL, 1902

Watching his congregations, he noted that one class did not come; "the ninety per cent. of the working classes, whose cathedral was the saloon, whose sacrament was a drunken bout, whose Bible the penny-dreadful," would not seek sanctuary; so, he went to them. From his ash-barrel pulpit, a tatterdemalion throng followed him into cottage-meetings; and then marched, singing, down the Goosegate into a chapel. From Nottingham he went to Cornwall; then to London's famous place of evil—the Whitechapel district. An old tent in a disused Quaker burial-ground in the East End was one station of expansion. It was blown down; and a dancing saloon was the seat of occupation on Sunday, and an old wool warehouse on Bethnal Green on week-day. By this time, the movement had a name—the Christian Mission. "The Christian Mission is a Salvation Army," General Superintendent William Booth dictated one night to his secretary. The words were repeated, and the movement had a new name. To catch the eye of the Whitby fishermen the title, "Captain" was introduced—a nautical rather than a military term—and one night, Captain Cadman referred to William Booth as "General of the Salvation Army." "It has stuck to me ever since. I never took the title," says the bearer. The leader found that military organization, terms and discipline, solidified his own forces and forwarded the great end he had in view, attracting the attention of the non-church-going masses, and he hesitated not to adopt them, in spite of the criticism his action invoked.

The Army, which at its humble inception was hunted from door to door and had no abiding place, has homes now in every land under the sun, numbering 7,616 corps, with over 75,000 officers and employees, and 609 social institutions for the poor; it supplies 4,000,000 beds and 6,000,000 meals annually.

The General's tour in this country will include Buffalo, Columbus, Toledo, Chicago, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Grand Forks, Kansas City, Denver, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Oakland, Sioux City, St. Joseph, St. Louis, Birmingham, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia.

GREAT OPPORTUNITIES

Sermon by Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage

Continued

Momentous is the fact that the past opportunities for doing good will never come back. There is many a man here who would be willing to cut off his right arm, if he could only bring back some of them. I once read of a father who, in anger, drove his son out of his home. The boy, on account of the father's bitterness, plunged into a life of sin. A few years later, he was dying in one of the London tenements. Just before his last breath was drawn, he told the city missionary who he was, and why he was dying. Then he sent to his irate parent these farewell words: "Tell father that I could have died happy, if he only had been willing to forgive me. Ask him to forgive me, even if I am dead." The missionary, as soon as he had closed the dead boy's eyes, went to the rich father's home. When he first met the parent and said, "I have come from your boy," the father's rage knew no bounds. He exclaimed in anger, "Don't talk to me about my son. I never want to see his face again while he is alive." But when the missionary said, "You will never see your boy's face again while he is alive. He is dead," the father broke down and sobbed like a child. He then said that he did want his boy back. And when he heard the dying message, his remorse was greater than he could bear. All the remainder of his earthly life that father kept brooding and regretting the severity of his treatment of his child. But his sorrow was useless. He could not bring back his dead boy. He could never undo the past wrong. His opportunity was gone, and gone forever. Mr. Moody, in one of his sermons, described how a wayward son who had broken his mother's heart, went back one dark night to the homestead. After roaming around the place where he had spent his childhood, he went out to the village graveyard. There, in the darkness of the night, he felt around the family plot until he found her new-made grave. There he lay flat upon the mound of earth, moaning and calling to the dead mother that he wanted her to forgive him. But her ears could not hear, nor her lips speak. The wayward boy, who had killed her, had lost his opportunity in this world to receive her forgiveness. Oh, my friends, as this Pauline word "opportunity" means so much, will you not beware how you misuse it; how you ill-treat it: how you spurn the chances for Christian usefulness which God is ready to give to all his children, and specially to them who will love and obey him and are eager to render service to him?

But I bethink myself that, as a pastor, I have to-day an infinite opportunity, which may never come to me again. I have an opportunity to present Jesus Christ to some young man or woman here who is not a member of the Christian Church, as were the friends to whom Paul wrote his Galatian letter. My brother or sister, I want you to come into the fellowship of the Lord Jesus Christ, so that you may have a part in these Gospel opportunities. I plead with you earnestly that you will confess Jesus Christ to-day, and become one of his disciples, even though no one may have spoken to you of religion for many years. You were brought up in a Christian home; but when that home was broken up on account of your parents' death, you drifted away from the church and from the teachings you learned at your mother's knee. You have not been to a church service for years. It may be because you were coolly treated, in one of the large city churches, when you first came to town. But last night, when you were alone in your room, you took down the old family album. Perhaps that was the first time you looked at the book for months. Then you became homesick for the old scenes of your childhood. Then you opened some of your dear mother's letters, now yellow from age. As you read them, the tears came to your eyes, yet you are a man now, or a matured woman, but the tears came nevertheless. And last night before you went to bed, you prayed, just as you used to do when a child. That is the reason you are in church this morning. That is the reason your heart is softened. That is the reason I press home the Gospel to your heart that I may start you forth, in Jesus' name, to Christian service. The opportunity for the salvation of your soul may never come so near to you again as just at this moment. Brother, sister, let me improve this opportunity by presenting to you the Lord Jesus. For your dear loved ones' sakes, who are among the redeemed, will you take Jesus now and become his true and loving disciple? Will you not here and now make this simple, earnest prayer, which a young man, sick of sin, made a few years ago in a large religious meeting: "Lord, take me as I am and make me what I ought to be." Now is your opportunity for salvation. Now! Now! Now!

THE MIGHT OF THE INVISIBLE

THE FALL OF JERICO

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCT. 19
JOSHUA 6: 12-20

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—HEB. 11: 30:
"BY FAITH THE WALLS OF JERICO FELL DOWN"

LET us ask the lonely palm tree, that once grew near Jericho, to tell us the story of the city. It sighs and says: "I used to have many hundreds of companions, but now, alas, I am the only one left. Our grove was eight miles in length, by three miles in width. We used to think our city by the Jordan was so protected by walls and mountains that it could not be taken by an enemy, and so we looked in wonder that day when we saw the Israelites, with General Joshua as their leader, marching toward Jericho. We wondered, because they were not equipped like other armies with battering rams to break down the strong walls. As they marched from Gilgal, they rested for a time under our shade, and we bent down our long leaf ears that we might hear them talk. We heard them say: 'It will be no harder for our God to break down the walls of Jericho, than it was to roll back the Jordan, and because he has done the one, we know he can do the other.' We were glad to hear this, for he is the same God whom we praise."

"You may not know it, but what you call 'cones' are our eyes, and so being full of eyes we watched the great host go forth against Jericho. At the head of the column was a company of their strongest men. Then came a group of seven priests, blowing trumpets for marching music. Then followed a strange looking golden box borne by other priests. We heard them call it the sacred ark. Then followed thousands upon thousands of marching Israelites. We saw this great host of a million people march around Jericho once every day for six days. The people of Jericho gathered on the walls to watch their strange foes, and jeered at them; but never a word answered the Israelites. On the seventh day they marched about the city seven times, and then the marching music was changed, with one long, loud blast, and then the great host shouted. But above the sound of their voices we heard the crash of falling walls, and saw that Jericho was conquered, and even while the dust was in our eyes, we felt the hot breath of the burning city. We saw the treasures of the city carried out by the Israelites, and heard their General Joshua tell them that none of these things were to be kept as their own, but all were to be used for God. We did see one man trying to hide a wedge of gold and some beautiful garments, but we afterwards heard that this man, they called Achan, was put to death for his wrong act."

"You lived on, did you, O palm tree?" "Oh yes, and another city was built, but without strong high walls, for God had said Jericho should never again be a walled city. We palm trees had been used to seeing men ride in chariots, but one day we saw a man taking a ride directly up into the sky in a chariot of fire, and he did not come down again. We listened to hear if anything would be said about it, and we heard fifty young men ask their teacher if they might not go and try to find the body of Elijah, but the teacher said, 'No'; but when they urged him hard, he let them go. We saw them when they came back after searching for three days, but they had not found him, for God had taken him to heaven." (II. Kings: 2).

"O palm tree, tell us, did you ever see the Lord Jesus in your city?" "Oh, yes, he cured two blind men as he was passing through the streets. There was a very small man who wanted very much to see Jesus and feared he could not for the crowd, and so he climbed into a low tree. We saw Jesus stop and speak to him, and then go home with him." (Luke 9).

"We should like to ask you, O palm tree, if Jericho was ever a beautiful city again?" "Yes, even more beautiful than at first, for some people, different from any we had ever seen, came and built grand houses to live in—'palaces' we heard them called—and the people were called Romans. General Marc Antony gave all of his palms to a queen called Cleopatra. She never came to see us, but one day Marc Antony had many of our beautiful branches stripped off—perhaps for her. And now my story is done. Nothing remains of the city but a few huts. I am weary and ready to join my dead companions." (This last palm tree died in 1835).

Illustration and Application

1. Sin and Judgment.
2. Repentance and Salvation.
3. "Saved to Serve."

The main truth in this story of Jericho's fall is that of the golden text, that faith is force, the invisible is the invincible; and that our own city can be conquered for God by united obedience to his orders on the part of the churches. Let that supreme subject and object be kept in view for at least half of the lesson time, allowing only brief consideration of those two controversial issues which would take the whole time if unrestrained: whether Rahab is "justified" in the Bible for lying, and whether the extermination of the Canaanites, beginning with the people of Jericho, can also be justified. As to this last, which lays at the foundation of our lesson a picture of sin and judgment (vs. 17, 21; see also Deut. 9: 1-6, Numb. 25 and 31), Prof. G. B. Wilcox gives the following answers to the question, "Why was it right that the Canaanites should be destroyed?"

"1. The Canaanites had become utterly abominable in character, foul in their idolatry, and in common life. The same God who destroyed Sodom by fire now chose the swords of his people. 2. It was as necessary that these polluted peoples should be exterminated, if the Israelites, who were to inhabit the land, were to be kept pure, as that all things infected with a contagious and deadly disease should be destroyed."

3. This awful judgment on idolatry and vice was needed to teach all concerned (by a fearful object-lesson, to an age so crude and sensuous that only something appealing to the senses could affect it) the enormity of those iniquities." It is always "a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," and our age especially needs to ponder "the wrath of the Lamb," the severity as well as gentleness of God.

As to Rahab, if she was excused for her falsehood (Josh. 2: 1-7; Heb. 11: 31; Jas. 2: 25), because her motive was good, and because her heathen training had not prepared her to "trust in God and do the right," it would certainly not be a precedent for us to trust a lie in a like emergency; indeed, the earliest book of the Bible shows that resorting to even a half lie to save life was even then proved to be both foolish and wicked (Gen. 12: 11-20; 26: 6-11). For us, Jennie Deans, of Walter Scott's "Heart of Midlothian," who told the truth when it seemed as if a lie might save her sister's life, is a better pattern than a scarlet heathen woman of three thousand years ago. The most profitable thing to consider in the Rahab story is her repentance and salvation, a fitting second chapter to go with the judgment upon Jericho. She abandoned her evil life, married Salmon, an Israelite, and became an ancestor of the noble Boaz, who married Ruth. That such a son could have come from such a woman shows how repentance may checkmate heredity; and, on the other hand, any attempt to credit Christ's sinless character to his human ancestry is cancelled by the fact that of the five women named in the Messianic line, Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba and Mary (Matt. 1: 3, 5, 6, 16), three were of stained character, which, in turn, puts the "scarlet thread" of mercy within reach of the vilest sinner who is willing to escape by it from the city of destruction (Josh. 2: 18, 21).

Through the centre of every rope made for the British Royal Navy runs a small red cord, the trade-mark and guarantee of its strength, and so through all the Bible the scarlet thread of sacrifice is the "sure and steadfast" cable of our hope of salvation here and hereafter.

"A tall chimney had been completed, and the scaffolding

HOUSES ON THE WALLS OF AN ORIENTAL CITY

hold of the twine. The rope was then fastened on. 'Pull away again.' He seized the rope and made it secure. There were a few moments of suspense as he slid down the rope, and then, amidst the shouts of the people, he threw himself into the arms of his wife, sobbing 'Thou'st saved me, Mary.'

The "scarlet thread" of Christ's atoning sacrifice is our only hope of escape from sin and its consequences and its punishment, and that is sufficient for the most desperate case.

Is there no thread that I may bind,
And in the judgment mercy find?
O yes, the blood that Jesus shed.
Was imaged in that scarlet thread.
O may that blood my soul adorn
In the momentous judgment morn.

But what is the message of this Jericho story to the saved hosts of the Church, confronting cities where wickedness has fortified itself

"Saved to Serve" behind the triple wall of appetite, greed and lust? "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." Let us not generalize from this story, as if it stood alone in Joshua's eventful life, that God's people are never to do anything by physical force but only by faith bringing to bear the might of the invisible.

Joshua was presently rebuked for praying, when he should have been punishing Achan. "Get thee up; wherefore liest thou upon thy face?" (Josh. 7: 10.) But the first scenes in the deliverance from Egypt—the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea with the miraculous overthrow of the Egyptian forces being matched by the miraculous crossing of the Jordan and the miraculous destruction of Jericho—were undoubtedly intended to teach the two generations involved, that their chief reliance must be upon the Invisible who spoke to Moses out of the fiery, cloudy pillar, and revealed himself yet more directly to Joshua, as the "Captain" of an invisible and invincible army. The Churches, their Sunday Schools and young peoples' societies, the Young Men's Christian Associations, and all other religious bodies, have in all ages needed constant reminders that their strength is not in numbers, or wealth or buildings or any of the things that are seen, which are temporal, but in unseen and eternal forces. It would seem as if in this day, of all others, when God's unseen forces of nature, discovered and harnessed by science, are running the wheels of commerce, enabling us to move about the world by train and automobile a mile a minute; to speak across half a continent by telephone, and presently across the sea by wireless telegraphy; when the silent light of the sun makes our pictures, and its heat in new motors turns the great wheels of factories, the invisible moral and spiritual forces would no longer be scouted as visionary, but studied with open minds. Edison, one of the greatest of electricians, though a street Arab in the years when he should have been taught of God in the Sunday School, has found him in his laboratory and has said, "I tell you that no person can be brought into close contact with the mysteries of nature or make a study of chemistry without being convinced that there is behind it all a Supreme Intelligence." If there is back of nature a mind like ours, but greater, we know by our own instincts, he must speak to us, he must deal with us in providence and prayer. The Bible tells us how we can avail ourselves of his omnipotence for conquering our Jerichos, whose sins alone are to be destroyed. Christians must unite and persist in the siege of "Mansoul," whether to save a sinner or a city. Some have suggested that Jericho's walls fell, as buildings and bridges have often fallen, because their keynote was struck by the ram's horns. If so, it was a miracle, for God ordered the blast. It is not likely, but this wonder illustrates again the power of invisible forces. It is the rule for even a few troops to silence their music and break step in crossing a bridge, lest its keynote shall be struck by music or measured tread.

"THE WALL FELL DOWN FLAT SO THAT THE PEOPLE WENT UP INTO THE CITY"

was being removed. One man remained on top to superintend the process. A rope should have been left for him to descend by. His wife was at home working, when her little boy burst in with 'Mother, mother, they've forgotten the rope, and father is going to throw himself down!' She rushed forth,—a crowd was looking up to the poor man, who was moving round and round the narrow cornice, terrified and bewildered. It seemed as if he might fall, or throw himself down at any moment. His wife, from below, cried out: 'Wait John! Take off thy stocking, unravel the worsted.' And he did so. 'Now tie the end to a bit of mortar, and lower it gently.' Down came the thread, and the bit of mortar, eagerly watched by many eyes. It came within reach, and was eagerly seized by one of the crowd. They fastened some twine to the thread. 'Now pull up.' The man got

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Piano

OF late years, music has grown to be so exacting, and the artistic ideal is so much higher than formerly, that people who think they can never learn to play the piano skilfully, do not try to learn it at all. Yet the ability to play passably gives so much pleasure in the family, and so brightens and cheers winter evenings, that it is a pity not to have one son or one daughter, at least, with the accomplishment. Pianos are of course costly, but they are less so than a generation ago, when almost every young girl of ordinary means, took "a few lessons," and, having mastered the score and the scales, learned to play pieces—"Silver Showers," "Golden Bells," "Storms at Sea," "Monastery Bells," variations on "Home, Sweet Home," and other popular airs. What genuine pride swelled the father's heart when his little girl sat down and entertained him with her first waltz, march, or polka, and how rigidly the mother maintained her watch that Nelly and Kitty might not shirk the practicing on which the teacher insisted. You would hardly believe it, in these days, but one of the most successful music teachers I ever knew, was an eccentric woman who never read a note, or took a lesson till she was past thirty. Then she hired a room over a dry-goods shop, bought a piano, and set diligently to work. She studied with dogged perseverance; she conquered difficulties; she forced her stiff fingers to move swiftly over the key-board, and after two or three years of this self-discipline, she took beginners and got them safely past their inevitable first drudgery. Miss Y— was the most emphatic of teachers in her avoidance of bad piano habits, and the most invincibly patient in the formation of good ones, and she went on teaching little children till she was fifty years old, when a short illness ended her life. Greatly was she missed, and sincerely was she lamented in the town where she had been a well-known figure, beloved by children and parents alike.

A person may not be able to vanquish the intricacies of classical music, but, no mean task, she may acquire the accomplishment of playing accompaniments, in perfect time. She may read music accurately. She may play simple melodies at sight. She may cultivate her musical memory, so that she has not to depend upon her notes.

A little music used to be the ordinary resource of the lady who gave a small evening company. If her daughter, her niece, her guest could play, she was sure that her little party would be a success.

Besides the piano, in a musical household there may be that rollicking friend of solitary people—the banjo—which Mr. Kipling has sung of so sweetly; the mandolin, the guitar, and the most fascinating of all instruments ever played by mortal man—the violin. Let us have music in our homes the coming winter, and, better still, melody in our hearts.

Dressing in One's Best

"Well," said a boy of fifteen, surveying himself with unusual complacency when he was arrayed in a handsome new suit, "I do like to be dressed in my best." Vanity is by no means monopolized by the feminine contingent. Men and boys have their full share of it. Throughout the lower creation, the male wears the finest colors, and the gayest markings distinguish his coat of fur or feathers. The female goes more soberly garbed than her lord. Women, in token of their supposed indoor condition and duties, in these days wear the rich satins and elegant silks and sheer laces. Men are satisfied with cloth of black, brown or gray, and set it off with white linen, a bit of color in a tie, and studs or sleeve-links of unobtrusive gold being their only proper adornment. Yet a man enjoys good clothes and likes to be clad as sumptuously as his purse will allow.

Every prudent woman knows that to put on her best clothes for common wear is to have nothing left wherewithal to appear on occasions. Therefore she cherishes the good gown in the closet, the nice hat in the bandbox, and the best shoes and gloves put carefully aside. A careful and thrifty matron tries to have some garments in reserve. The second-best gown is a great comfort. One may enjoy it, and not worry lest anything happen to it.

Wherever practicable, a woman should make an afternoon toilette, so that her dress, either with a knot of ribbon at her throat or in her hair, or her fresh gown and apron if she be busy about her house, may have an air of leisure, different from the work-a-day look of her morning dress.

The children enjoy seeing their mother well dressed, and insensibly the household is toned up, and grows more parti-

IN A WESTERN WHEAT FIELD

A "HARVEST GANG" READY FOR WORK

In these days of mammoth farms (embracing many thousands of acres), steam harvesters and cultivators, and a great variety of mechanical devices for aiding the modern agriculturist, the poetry and romance of the plough are in danger of passing away altogether. The contrast between the old-fashioned, sturdy farmer of fifty years ago working the land with a mere handful of help, and the model farmer of to-day with his imposing array of machines and his big force of workers, is a very striking one. Yet, even with all the improvements machinery affords, the crops this year are so enormous that they tax the abilities of the farmers in many States to harvest them. Our photographs give some idea of scenes familiar in Missouri, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas and many other States at this season of the year.

The Autumn Wedding

JUNE and October are the favorite wedding months. The October wedding may have for its brilliant background chrysanthemums in their golden glory, asters, salvia, late roses, and the splendor of autumn leaves. If the wedding takes place in church, there may be a procession to the altar, of the bride's mother, the little flower-girls, the maid or matron of honor, and the veiled and white-robed bride leaning on her father's arm. The groom, waiting at the chancel, will step forward to meet his bride, and very softly, the organ will play during the ceremony. Following the marriage in church, there is usually a reception at the home of the bride, where friends offer congratulations and partake of refreshment which may be elaborate or simple as the bride's parents prefer. Great display is uncalled for, and is rather vulgar than otherwise. A bridal party at home may be as beautifully arranged for as in church. The contracting parties should stand, facing the minister, at the end of the parlor; or, if they choose, they may face the company, and the clergyman stand with his back to the guests. The bride should dress either in white or in her traveling dress; in the latter case, wearing her hat. A reception gown is not quite as appropriate for the one grand function in which a young woman takes part, as a queen on her coronation day.

Announcement cards are sent out immediately after a wedding. Invitations should go two weeks before it. The bride, before her marriage, if possible, writes personal notes of thanks to those who send her presents. If she has not time for this, she does it very soon after the wedding. Every expense, except the ring, the carriage to go away, and the fee to the minister, must be paid by the bride's people.

In the furnishing of the new home, the table and bedlinen are provided by the bride, and the other furniture by the groom. One well-to-do father of my acquaintance builds a new home for each of his daughters when she marries, and fully furnishes it from attic to cellar. Few fathers can do so much. If it be known that young people are about to set up housekeeping, those who send them gifts may very appropriately select articles which will be of use in the home. Silver should be sent unmarked, so that if duplicated, the bride may exchange it at her pleasure, and that she may have it engraved to suit her own taste. It is customary to engrave wedding silver with the initials or monogram of the bride, though at present an intertwined device, with the initials of both bride and groom, is in favor.

Reading Aloud

Some years ago, two young people, whose advantages in school had been limited, married, and went to live in a factory town, where the husband had employment. The wife did her own work, and the little home was as neat as a pin and as beautifully clean as hands could make it. As both were anxious to add to their stock of book knowledge, they decided to read to one another nightly, and to take up really good literature. Beginning with Shakespeare, they spent the evenings of one winter with that poet of perennial bloom and youth. Another year they devoted to Scott. Still another to Thackeray. The result is that few college graduates excel these two home students in richness of vocabulary and in real mental culture. The wonderful Beecher family, so many of whom became famous, were accustomed, in Lyman Beecher's parsonage, to a great deal of reading aloud.

From childhood they were familiar with the best English literature afforded, and it was such training that helped to make them what they became in mature years.

The International Tribunal

OUR Government, in connection with that of Mexico, has the honor of being the first to appear before the International Tribunal, which was established by the Peace Conference of the Hague, for the settlement of international disputes. It is true that this is not the first time that we have agreed to submit our wrongs to arbitration, instead of appealing to the sword; but this is especially interesting as being the first case to come before the tribunal, which, it is hoped, will eventually so thoroughly gain the confidence of the nations as to avert the horrors of war all over the world. The time may come when people of every clime will look back to this case, as the pioneer of a long series of disputes which shall have been settled peacefully, instead of being made the subject of sanguinary conflict.

It is a significant fact that the question at issue between the United States and Mexico, which is now before the court, is one that touches the two most prolific sources of wars—religion and the rights of property. The tribunal is required to decide whether a certain fund, known as the Pious Fund, belongs of right to the Mexican Government, which has seized it, or to the Roman Catholic Church in California. The fund, as explained by United States Senator Stewart of Nevada, who is senior counsel for the United States, was originally designed to establish missions in lower California, when that district formed part of Mexico. It would appear that of right the income of that fund should be administered by the representatives of the church in California; but Mexico holds that the income from the fund was designed to benefit and civilize Spanish and Mexican people, and should therefore belong to it for educational purposes. This is the question that the tribunal is asked to decide. The case has already been opened by Senator Stewart, and is now regularly before the court. The issue is not one of vital interest to the whole country; but it may be hoped that it will be wisely settled, so that when other questions of greater importance arise, European statesmen will avail themselves of the services of the court, instead of rushing into war, which never decides anything but the relative fighting capacity of the nations involved.

THE unbelieving heart says, He is not coming; I will eat, I will drink, I will be merry. I will go on following the bent of my inclinations, indulging my appetites and passions. Where is the promise of His coming? I will live as I list. It is all a delusion.

So a man finds across the channel of a deep stream a wide, thick, solid dam. He gets down below the dam, where the channel is dry, and he says, There is no water here, and none coming soon, if ever. People see no signs of it, and I will build me a house here. But just above the water is steadily flowing, and the line on the dam rises day by day. He does not see it. He says: There is no danger of any water coming down here. And it rises and it deepens, and the violence and the weight accumulate and press against the dam. And he says, Where is the indication of its coming? At last, all suddenly, the dam breaks under the mighty pressure, and the overwhelming waters fall upon him and sweep him away.

"Though I tarry, yet I will not tarry," saith the Lord. It is not really tarrying. The events are filling up, the day is approaching, and we are continually nearer to it. God help us to look at it as an event on our individual horizon, and not merely as an event on the horizon of the world.

A Frank Criticism

THE desire of the Scottish poet that some power might be given us to enable us to see ourselves as others see us, has been partially fulfilled, so far as missionary work in China is concerned. A missionary magazine publishes a report of a conference of native workers recently held at Ching-chou-fu, at which there appears to have been some rather plain speaking, from which we may learn the opinions the Celestial Christian entertains of the present condition of the Christian Church. The subject set down for discussion was, "The Defects of the Church," and the members of the conference, who, it must be remembered, were all Christians, and the majority of them preachers, evangelists, or native teachers, were invited to speak freely. They appear to have availed themselves of the opportunity. Among the characteristics they cited, which in their opinion existed, and were obstacles to the growth of the Church, were: Too great dependence on the secular powers; lack of earnestness; love of money; and finding fault with others rather than with one's self.

With our limited knowledge of the people with whom these Chinese speakers have come in contact, we cannot say whether their criticism was just. Looking at home, however, we are not quite comfortable under this indictment of the Christian character. If those Chinamen came here and visited the churches in our great cities, would they have expressed a different opinion? It seems to us that these faults, on which the clear-sighted Celestials laid their fingers, have been heard of in our own land. They sound only too familiar. The critics were right, too, in regarding them as defects and obstacles to the growth of the Church. We have found them to be so. It is sad to think that these defects should exist, in spite of the fact that every one of them was denounced by the Divine Founder of the Church. We carry the Gospel to China, and the quiet, sagacious, observant native, watching us, as we tell him what that Gospel means, and how it transforms the character, frankly tells us that we are guilty of these things. It is extremely humiliating, especially as we know that he is right. It should send us to our knees, entreating that the Holy Spirit may exercise refining power, so that the Gospel of our Lord may no longer be hindered in its onward progress by the faults of those who bear his name.

A Temperance "Straw"

"STRAWS" says the old proverb, "show how the wind blows." It was a pretty substantial straw that was allowed to be blown from the recent Liquor Dealers' Convention at Pittsburg. It became apparent during the Convention that there was a good deal of apprehension over the prospects of a widespread temperance revival. In Kentucky, local option, already very formidable, may crystallize in legislation that would close all the whisky-factories in the State. Texas, too, is becoming so alarmingly temperate that the liquor men look upon it as practically lost to their cause. Other States have "weakly consented" to the adoption of temperance principles to an extent that threatens to undermine the influence of the hitherto invincible liquor power. Something must be done—and quickly—those liquor delegates claimed, if the trade meant to retain its time-honored hold upon the souls, bodies and pocket-books of the American people. Such a condition of affairs in any ordinary political convention might have started an uproar, or even caused a stampede. But the liquor men, knowing that confusion would be fatal, held themselves well in hand and kept a stiff upper lip. They decided that the only way to restore to alcohol its ancient dominion, was to begin a campaign of education forthwith.

Such a campaign we can almost imagine as being not unlike that waged by Diabolus against the city of Mansoul, when Eye-Gate, Ear-Gate, Mouth-Gate, and the other gates of the city had been closed against him. The campaign of the liquor men must be one to "educate" the people into a love and admiration of all that degrades and brutalizes man and effaces the image of his Maker. A campaign it must be to commend broken-hearted wives, ruined homes, neglected children; to popularize dishonor, bankruptcy, and pauperism; to uphold violence, and crime of every sort; to take all that is noble and pure and uplifting away from life, and to substitute the dust and ashes of misery, remorse and hopeless despair.

We will watch the progress and the results of this unique campaign with intense interest. Meanwhile, let the cohorts of temperance keep their forces in battle line, for it is an insidious foe with whom they have to deal.

—In our next issue will appear the first of a series of articles entitled "Quaint Psalms for Queer People," by the well-known evangelist, Rev. C. H. Yatman. In brief, characteristic language, full of rare spirituality, yet essentially practical, and enlivened with unexpected flashes of good-natured humor, Mr. Yatman gives to each of the Psalms a distinctive appellation and interpretation. "Quaint Psalms" should be read everywhere, as their interest and application are as wide as the globe itself.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Lost Opportunities

—THE MISTAKES of youth can never be corrected. Time gone is gone forever. An opportunity passed the thousandth part of a second has by one leap reached the other side of a great eternity. In the autumn, when the birds migrate, you look up and see the sky black with wings and the flocks stretching out into many leagues of air, and so to-day I look up and see two large wings in full sweep. They are the wings of the flying year. That is followed by a flock of three hundred and sixty-five, and they are the flying days. Each of the flying days is followed by twenty-four, and they are the flying hours, and each of these is followed by sixty, and these are the flying minutes. Where did this great flock start from? Eternity past. Where are they bound? Eternity to come. You might as well go agunning for the quails that whistled last year in the meadows, or the robins that last year caroled in the sky, as to try to fetch down and bag one of the past opportunities of your life. Do not say, "I will lounge now and make it up afterward." Young men and boys, you cannot make it up.

The World's Hunger

—SUPPOSE THAT SOME of the energy we are expending in useless and unavailing talk about the bread question should be expended in merciful alleviations. I read that the battlefield on which more troops met than on any other in the world's history was the battlefield of Leipsic, one hundred and sixty thousand men under Napoleon, two hundred and fifty thousand men under Schwarzenberg. No, no! The greatest and most terrific battle is now being fought all the world over; it is the struggle for food. The ground tone of the finest passage in one of the great musical masterpieces, the artist says, was suggested to him by the cry of the hungry populace of Vienna as the king rode through and they shouted, "Bread! Give us bread!" And all through the great harmonies of musical academy and cathedral I hear the pathos, the ground tone, the tragedy, of uncounted multitudes, who with streaming eyes and wan cheeks and broken hearts, in behalf of themselves and their families, are pleading for bread.

An Easy Song

—ONE OF THE easiest songs to learn is the Song of the Drunkards. Anybody can learn it. In a little while you can touch the highest note of conviviality or the lowest note of besottedness. Begin moderately, a sip here and a sip there. Begin with claret, go on with ale, and wind up with cognac. First take the stimulant at a wedding, then take it at meals, then take it between meals, then all the time keep your pulse under its stealthy touch. In six months the dullest scholar in this Apollonian music may become an expert. First it will be sounded in a hiccup. After a while it will be heard in a silly ha! ha! Further on it will become a wild whoop. Then it will enable you to run up and down the five lines of the musical staff infernal. Then you will have mastered it—the Song of the Drunkards.

Among the Workers

—REV. HUGH BROWN, the Chicago evangelist, is conducting a series of revival meetings in Alameda, Cal.

—REV. E. PAYSON HAMMOND, the evangelist, is still actively engaged in conducting meetings for children, youths and adults.

—REV. DR. SMILEY and musical director Professor McKinsey, with the co-operation of the churches, are conducting revival meetings in a large tent in Auburn, Ind.

—REV. CORTLANDT MYERS, who has just completed his ninth year as pastor of the Brooklyn Temple, has built up, it is claimed, the largest congregation and Sunday School in the city.

—THE LAST General Assembly of Arizona passed a local option law, permitting any community not smaller than a school district to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within its boundaries by a two-thirds vote. Recently an election was held under that law in a district embracing a large part of Maricopa County, exclusive of the city of Phoenix, and comprising about fifteen hundred square miles, and the sale of intoxicating liquors was prohibited by a vote of more than three to one. The result has been the closing of all the road-houses located about and outside the corporate limits of the city of Phoenix, which were the worst dens of iniquity to be found in the county. The Prohibition Alliance, a local organization, and the Good Templars, assisted by the churches, were the most potent factors in securing this desired result.

An Earnest Appeal to YOV

WE recently published an appeal to our subscribers to send us the names of 25 adult Protestant Church Members, and the response was both prompt and generous—resulting in NEARLY A MILLION NAMES. We had, however, planned for greater things, and, in addition to the names we then had on hand and those recently received, we need at least another million to complete the number we first had in view. We, therefore, issue this NEW APPEAL, and hope that all who have not yet responded will kindly favor us by sending in their lists.

Our aim is to largely increase our Subscription List, by sending out a CHRISTIAN HERALD Prospectus for 1903 to MILLIONS OF NEW PEOPLE, and we are quite sure that all who may receive this beautifully illustrated Prospectus, will thank those who made it possible for us to send it to them. Our subscribers will of course receive their own copies of it as soon as issued.

If you did not respond to the first call, please respond to this. By so doing, you will help along THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the good cause of pure and elevating literature. This is a HOME MISSIONARY EFFORT and, apart from the beautiful Calendar which we mail to all who send us a list, it will, like every good deed, be in itself its own reward.

Never before in the history of our country was there more urgent occasion for the wider spread of Gospel Truth than now, and the Children of the King, if they will, can do most to help us. Those who have read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD know that no other paper is so well adapted for the end in view, and we cannot but believe that EVERY SUBSCRIBER who reads this appeal, will be glad of the opportunity offered to co-operate with us in the good work contemplated.

To enable all who have not already done so to aid us in our efforts, we have extended the date of mailing the lists of new names to October 17th, by which time we hope to receive AT LEAST ANOTHER MILLION.

Will You Help Us, and Help Us To-day?

You will find opposite page 827, our former offer repeated, and we trust that you will consider it sufficiently attractive to induce a prompt and generous response to this appeal.

We Invite Your Hearty Co-operation

Planning Greater Things

WE are about to inaugurate the most vigorous campaign in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with a view to greatly enlarging its field of usefulness, by means of a largely increased Subscription List, and we earnestly invite the hearty co-operation of every present subscriber.

A Fair Proposition

Indeed, we are sure that the tens of thousands who for many years have drawn inspiration and comfort from its columns, will consider it a privilege to render some substantial service to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will hail with pleasure the opportunity we now afford.

But THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is always ready to give generous recognition to each and every effort, kindly put forth by its subscribers, with a view to co-operating with the plans of its management. So today we come before our subscribers with an opportunity for service in the one hand and with generous recognition in the other, and we say to each and every one personally as follows:

Dear Friend,—We want your assistance in securing for us, in your immediate neighborhood, the names and addresses of 25 adult church-going people, no two of whom should live in the same house, but all of whom must be permanent residents of the town. We want those names for the purpose of sending these good people our profusely illustrated Prospectus and premium propositions for the coming year.

Stupendous Figures

We are planning to reach five million people. To do this will entail a cash outlay of over $100,000, $50,000 of which would be required for One-Cent Stamps; but we believe that if we sow the seed bountifully, the Lord of the Harvest will give us the increase. Yet we would not waste a grain of this seed, as we learn that only that which falls on good ground produces a crop worth harvesting.

Every Subscriber a Friend

We feel that without the co-operation of our subscribers, we cannot undertake so great a work successfully. But as every subscriber on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD list is a personal friend of the paper, we know that we may confidently expect them to co-operate with us by best and richest of its kind THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has ever sent out. You will find its description in the centre square on this page, and we guarantee entire satisfaction.

A Superb Christmas Gift

This Drop-Leaf Calendar will make most attractive Christmas Gift, and we are confident that when it reaches your hands you will feel that our recognition of your kind co-operation is as generous as was your willingness to help us carry out the great plans we have in view for the enlargement of our subscription list.

We wish to impress on you one thing more and that is, that these names will not be of any service to us if mailed later than the 17th day of October, 1902, as the preparations necessary for so huge an undertaking make it imperative that we stop receiving names immediately after that date.

Be sure to use the blank form on reverse side of this page.

Now the sending of 25 names is not difficult undertaking; yet by doing so you will help along the great work in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is engaged. Surely we may depend on you for this favor, and when you get the Calendar, you will agree with us that your labor was not in vain.

Let All Lend a Hand

We know very well that most of our subscribers would gladly oblige us in this matter without any other compensation than the consciousness that they have aided in the circulation of the paper they so dearly love; but inasmuch as we have arranged for this beautiful Calendar, it would be a gratification to us to know that not one of the great number of our friends has been overlooked in its distribution.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Throbbing Earth

MANY years have passed since so extensive a series of earthquakes and other phenomena, indicating internal terrestrial agitation, have been recorded as during the past six months. They commenced with the terrible Martinique disaster of May 8. Since that time, ten serious earthquakes have been reported, respectively in Italy, Australia,

STRATA REVEALED BY DEEP BORING

Great Britain, India, Turkey, the Philippines, South America and Turkestan. The last named was felt most severely at Kashgar, in which city and its neighborhood fully one thousand persons were buried under the buildings suddenly overturned. Acting in sympathy with these perturbations, the volcanoes in various parts of the world have developed extraordinary activity. These burning mountains are separated over the earth's surface. One of them, in Alaska, was believed to be extinct, but is now belching forth mud, stones and lava. Another, in Chaco territory, in South America, destroyed two whole villages. In August, a volcano on the Japanese Island of Tori Shima wholly depopulated the island, and in September Mont Pelee broke out again and caused the death of two thousand persons, covering with mud, stones and lava an area ten times as great as at the eruption in May. The subterranean connection gave other evidence in New Zealand, where the geysers burst into new activity, one of them, known as the Waimangu Geyser, sending its hot, black water to a height of eight hundred feet. A period so remarkable for subterranean disturbance has not been noted in many years. So tremendous is the agitation going on, that a scientist ventures to suggest the possibility of the old earth being rent asunder, as shown in the accompanying illustration. It is certain that violent movements are taking place in the molten strata beneath the earth's surface, but whether there is any possibility of such a rent occurring as that depicted, no man can say. Doubtless many will be alarmed by the mere suggestion. It would be well if all who are so disturbed took the Apostle's advice:

The elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and Godliness? (II. Peter 3: 10-11).

The Fatal Third Rail

A remarkable accident is reported from Hartford, Conn. It appears that at an out-of-town crossing near New Britain, the rail which carries the electricity for the cars between Hartford and Bristol is exposed. During a heavy rain storm last week, a woman, with a two-year-old child in her arms, passed over the track. She was walking hurriedly through the rain, and had just crossed the rail when she gave a loud scream and fell to the ground. Passers-by ran to her assistance. When she was lifted up it was found that she was badly burned and that her child was dead. Electricians explain that her skirts, soaked with the rain, in sweeping over the third rail, completed the electric circuit and she had received a current of two thousand volts. It was surprising that it did not kill her, but she was a strong, healthy woman, and she escaped with severe burns. Her child, however, who had received the shock through his mother's arms, came to his death instantly. The poor child, doubtless, thought that if any place was safe, it was in his mother's arms, yet as it proved, it was in this case especially dangerous. Few children lose their lives in such a way, but how many lose their souls through the mistaken affection of their parents, who forbear to train them in the fear of God.

I will judge his house forever for the iniquity which he knew; because his sons did bring a curse on themselves, and he restrained them not (I. Samuel 3: 13).

A Fortune Lost by Lack of Faith

A press dispatch from Santa Cruz, Cal., describes the chagrin of a business man in that neighborhood, who has just discovered that, by his neglect of an offer, he has missed getting a fortune. Among his employees was a man whom he engaged about three years ago, more as a matter of charity than of business. The man was in desperate need and was in ill health. He was extremely grateful to his employer, and often insisted that he owed his life to his kindness. He used to talk of a lawsuit in which he was interested, and which, he declared, would one day make him a rich man. His employer and the other employees regarded the story as a delusion, and ridiculed it. The man insisted, however, that it was true, and declared that when he came into his property he would show his gratitude to the good man who had befriended him in his emergency. About three months ago he fell ill, and then, convinced that he was going to die, he sent to his employer, asking him to send a lawyer to him to draw a deed which that the eternal inheritance offered them through Christ is so much more desirable than they ever realized.

Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief (Heb. 4: 11).

Largest Sailing Vessel in the World

As if to prove that this hemisphere is not to have a monopoly of huge productions, Germany is sending across the Atlantic the largest sailing vessel in the world. She is named the Preussen, and her objective port is on the west coast of South America. The dimensions of this huge craft are: Length, 440 feet; breadth, 50 feet; depth, 33 feet. Her displacement when fully laden is 11,150 tons; she will carry 8,000 tons, and her registered tonnage is 4,000 tons. She was built of steel in a shipbuilding yard at Geestemünde, which has a great reputation for fast sailing vessels. All her five masts are full-rigged, and all her yards, which number thirty, as well as her masts and topmasts, even her top-gallant-masts, are of steel, there being no wood aloft, except the blocks. She carries 550 tons of water ballast in her double bottom. The winches, capstan, pumps and steering gear are worked by steam. The crew consists of forty-six hands in all. The Preussen belongs to a Hamburg firm, which has a whole fleet of swift sailing vessels, all of them first-class clippers, the largest one having hitherto been the Potosi, which is fully forty feet shorter than the Preussen. The owners probably argue that, as the vessel will be propelled by the winds, which cost them nothing, they can carry freight so much more cheaply than could be done on a steamer, in which the consumption of coal is so heavy an expense. The vessel, however, will be much slower than a steamer and so there will be a loss of time. In such matters men, as a rule, prefer to use a force that they can control, instead of depending on a force over which they have no power. Too often this is done also in spiritual matters, but there human means fail, as the preacher long ago declared.

THE "PREUSSEN," THE LARGEST SAILING VESSEL IN THE WORLD

Behold, this have I found, that God made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions (Eccles. 7: 29).

BRIEF NOTES

King Leopold of Belgium has finally signed the bill abolishing gambling at Ostend and Spa. The clubs at those resorts will consequently close permanently after this season.

A crusade against alcohol is being carried on in France, and strong pressure is being brought to bear on the government to make the recently-published report of the Academy of Medicine the basis of practical legislation.

The Prefect of Chen-chau says the murders of the two missionaries, Messrs. Bruce and Lewis, were perpetrated by a mob excited by a woman, who scattered poison in the streets, alleging that she was employed by the foreigners.

We regret to hear that Mrs. Thoburn, the beloved wife of Bishop J. M. Thoburn, is dead. She was a patient sufferer for a long time from a disease contracted in India in her devoted labors in the cause to which her distinguished husband has given his life. He will have the sincere sympathy of Christians of all denominations in his sad bereavement.

A magnificent Bible is to be presented to King Edward VII. by the British and Foreign Bible Society, in commemoration of his Coronation. It is in Royal red morocco, richly laid, with designs adapted from various early Christian symbols and ornamental work. In the centre of the cover is a cross with an interlaced pattern in gold; vine leaves and bunches of grapes are represented, the whole being surrounded by a border of ears of wheat.

would convey to him his interest in the suit. The employer, however, paid no attention to the request, and though the sick man pleaded with him and begged him to have a lawyer make a will in his favor, he took no steps to comply. When, however, the man died recently, he fulfilled a promise he had made to notify some people at Des Moines, Ia., of his decease. He received a reply expressing regret of the writer at the news, and deploring the fact that the man had not lived to inherit his property. Not knowing that his correspondent had heard the story of the litigation and had been so near having a personal interest in it, he informed him that his deceased employee's lawsuit had been decided in his favor, and $19,500, the first instalment of the proceeds, was then lying in the bank to his credit. How many will feel the chagrin that this employer feels, and with infinitely greater cause, when they discover

Laurel Point. The ground has been given, and some pictures will illustrate to you the beautiful surroundings. I think they will call the college "Louise Log College," and I have chosen for them the highest point seen from the college campus, back of the church, for the college observatory, when the institution shall grow to it. There is no better place. Do you know that it gave joy to me, last night, when a young man said that if I would come back to the dedication of the new College, next May, he would ride with me to Hazard, the county seat of Perry, and on through Whitesburg, thence to Middlesboro, and then over to Cumberland Gap, "only sixty miles," he said, "and splendid mountains, as rough as you please, with trails up and down to ride over."

Why can you not help us to these great things? This noble Log College shall yet fill Grant-Lee Hall with students from the mountains, and we will keep them so entertained, that boys and girls will not need to marry till they pass beyond their teens.

OLIVER OTIS HOWARD,
Maj.-Gen. U. S. A. (Retired).

A Mountain Sunday School

CROCKETTSVILLE, KY.

Imagine how the Kentucky River forks, and then take with me the Middle Fork, and stop over Sunday at the Canoe settlement. The Canoe, a mountain boy told me, was named for a canoe "dug-out" discovered by the first settlers. Just now, Canoe Creek has a dry, stony bottom, with here and there a pool of water.

Early Monday morning our little party—Dr. Guerrant and Miss Anne on mules, and Gen. Howard on a fine horse (that's the way they treat me—always giving me the best), set out down the Canoe Creek. The sun was pretty hot, and we stood for a few moments under the ample shade of some grand old beech trees, where the first Sunday School was held for the hundred children roundabout. Oh! what grand results since then; as I told you in my last letter: but I raised my hat in respect and reverence for the tree-temple.

At a beautiful spot we crossed the Middle Fork, and began the ascent of the valley of Turner's Creek. It is difficult to find many families up that narrow creek and its tiny branches, whose names are not Turner. The mountains border every water stream, yet the people manage to plant corn two-thirds of the way to the peak-tops. They raise some sorghum and tobacco in this valley. Under the direction of Dr. Saunders the people have constructed a little log church and mission house, and named it for Mrs. Gordon, one of the Soul Winners' faithful and efficient missionaries. Miss McPheters has replaced Mrs. Gordon as teacher here. It would do you good to look into her happy face.

The venerable Dr. Saunders has spent months in this valley. Mr. "Tabby John"

Turner and his family entertained us in their house of log construction.

MOUNTAINEERS' GREETINGS

At the end of seven miles from Turner's Creek, we are at Crockettsville. "Berry" Turner, fifty years of age, and not looking forty, ran out to give each of us a hearty greeting. In him I found strength, and a natural grace, full of hospitality to all around. The venerable Dr. Saunders was here. His daughter, full of love for her father, and zeal for her mission, situated some five miles further "up the Fork," stayed a few moments, and then rode off with Mr. Murdoch, Dr. Guerrant's inspector of missions, to her promising field. Later, we will tell you of it, and of the College just emerging into being. I stayed with Dr. Saunders at "Berry" Turner's, while my companions pushed on to the store and home of Edward Callahan.

A THRIVING SECTION

Here the people are better off than at other missions. Mr. Callahan, Berry Turner and others have given the land, and built a neat, beautiful church. In the evening we had a service. You will not know what singing is until you come and hear the children, led by Miss Lillie Callahan and the cabinet organ. Then Dr. Guerrant's preaching, so searching and fearless, to the mountain people, hungry for the good news, and thirsty for the "Water of Life." Gen. Howard told them some army stories of men who died for him. Many pictures of Jesus' life were on the walls of the little church. It was easy to carry the minds of the audience to Him who gave His life for every boy and girl, man and woman of the mountains.

FEUDS DISAPPEARING

The changes that have come here, following the "good tidings," are peace, joy, neighborly kindness, and ever increasing prosperity. Strong men who were leaders in feuds and desperate work are now elders and leaders in this community, shepherds whom the Master owns.

We have now come to Tuesday, the 9th of September. The venerable minister (Dr. Saunders) rose at half-past four, and taking a light breakfast, mounted his horse, and rode away the many miles to his temporary abode at Elkatawa. Young men would consider this a hardship; but this "Soul Winner" finds no hardship in his devotion and self-sacrifice, even when ill. A heavy rain has fallen, and it gives us the thought of blessings.

A MUSICAL PRODIGY

In spite of the rain, a fair congregation—rather more men than women—gathered at the beautiful little church. Berry Turner's little girl, Matilda, sat at the instrument, and was playing a hymn when we entered. I asked her to play "Revive us Again," which I had heard her render at home early in the morning. She sang it and played the accompaniment, and all joined in the chorus. It is a mystery to me, how a child of twelve, who has not yet learned a note as written in the books, can carry in her head so many tunes, and give them with grace and harmony.

Dr. Guerrant drew our hearts to Christ, because we belong to him, our souls being purchased by his blood. He dwelt particularly upon ownership, and the rights of ownership, and the privileges which infinite love grants to ownership, using such illustrations that every child understood him. His utterance is rapid and decisive, and his intense prayer called down blessings. Gen. Howard followed him with a few testimonies, showing that our heavenly Father is a hearer and answerer of prayer.

Long's Creek was revived this morning by an abundant rain. It fails sometimes but this spiritual Fountain will never fail its influence will extend far and wide, and be a blessing to the mountain youth.

This afternoon, the sun has come out again and given us pictures more beautiful than we can describe. The fall coloring has begun, and the mountain tops are covered with bouquets of forest trees of every variety. I wish your readers could sit with me on Berry Turner's ample porch and take in all that nature exhibits and sympathize as we do with the wants of a noble people. Sometime, surely, all your privileges will come to them.

OLIVER OTIS HOWARD,
Major-General (Retired).

The Western Forest Fires

FROM a reader in Home Valley, Wash., we have received the following vivid description of the great forest fires, and the consequent suffering in that section of the Union:

The whole of Skamania County, Wash., is on fire, or has been. There have been three fires started that I know of in this county, two by men, and one by lightning. Skamania County is along the Columbia River. The wind has been blowing a gale. At Collins, east of us, there were 1,000 cords of wood ablaze in the woods. Everybody moved every article out of the houses and scattered them around in the clearings. We are all home-steaders here. We knew the fire would come. Oh, the agony and suspense of waiting, perhaps to lose our lives! Some fled toward the Columbia River, but most of us stuck to our homesteads. The fire struck us about three o'clock September 11. The wind blew such a gale that it was useless to try to save houses or barns. We were gathered in a small marsh, with long green grass, and that saved our lives, God overruling all. It was not ten minutes after the fire came before we were literally surrounded by flames. At first we could only pray God to spare our lives, as we thought surely if we did not die from the fire, we would expire from suffocation. Providentially the wind blew away the smoke. There were with us three women, one just up from a sick-bed, five small children and one man. We watched house and barn go up in flames—every building swept clean! All that night the flames raged around us, the sparks flying in showers in every gust of wind. With a wet broom or wet gunny sack we quenched the sparks as they alighted. As we realized that we were saved, we felt great thankfulness in our hearts; but oh the anxiety I felt about my aged mother and father, who live on a homestead about two miles away!

At daylight my husband went through the still burning woods and found father and mother safe. They fought the fire in the grass to keep it out of the clearing, and they had a wonderful deliverance. The fire went slowly all around them.

At Collins, of six homesteaders, three have lost everything. At Home Valley, of eighteen settlers and families, six have lost house, barn, hay, every building on the clearing, orchards, etc., but saved most of the household goods. There have been terrible fires on the Oregon side of the Columbia also. All through here people are without homes, some are in tents, and some, discouraged, are leaving the place. Winter is coming, and we have no house, barn, or hay for stock, nor money to build. We must go where the men can get work and so get through the winter that way.

Home Valley Wash. MRS. M. L. ERICKSON.

The Very Best of All Bibles

The Red Letter Bible is the best practical working Bible I ever saw. You have struck upon an idea that will cause a great number to read who never read the Bible before.

CHILD WORK IN AFRICA

ALTHOUGH the children in native African homes are made to work and obey almost as soon as they are able to walk, the tasks assigned them are not laborious. Rev. Erwin H. Richards, of the Inhambane Mission, writes interestingly of these dark-skinned boys and girls. He says:

"Our schoolgirls are all baptized members of our church, and are worthy of the name they profess. Two of them have been supported by Mrs. Bonnell, of Brooklyn, and by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One is our most faithful and trustful Pabanyana, redeemed from polygamy by the kindness and good judgment of your readers. Her grandfather is chief of the Makodweni tribe. In a little time, these girls will all be heads of out-stations, and our mission has a right to be proud of them. Jumanyana, another of our girls, is also a grandchild of the same chief mentioned.

"I send you a photograph of our boys at the mill. They are all Christians, and entitled to the name. The little one in front was born on our station of our first converts, and his father is a preacher. In two years more, they will all be sent out to set up stations of their own, and they will doubtless do their work well.

"Many of the native children, just like these, are wild to-day, though living within half a mile of a mission out-station; but if we had the means to support them, they could be readily gathered into the mission fold. If not taken by the mission, they will inevitably grow up in the kraal, and the girls will become the third or seventh wife. We would be only too glad to take all of them into our mission, to be trained as Christians, if our people at home would stand by us and supply the means."

AFRICAN MISSION BOYS GRINDING CORN MEAL

Books for Consumptives

The following extract is from a letter written from Fort Stanton, New Mexico:

At the Sanatorium here for consumptive seamen and steamboat men, a number of young men are holding weekly Gospel services and doing what they can for the souls of the sick and dying who stand in need of religious teaching. The population is about one hundred and sixty, including attendants. Healthy mental occupation is desirable for these afflicted ones. Through the kindness of Miss Helen Gould, we have a nice library; but more books should be in it. Could we request the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have books to spare to donate them to the library—cloth rather than paper-bound, are desirable, as the service will pay shipping charges. We do not ask for money—only for books. If those who wish to add to our library will communicate with Dr. P. M. Carrington, Fort Stanton, New Mexico, he will use every effort to secure free transportation.

A Perpetual Guest

The Red Letter Bible, received as premium for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is a perpetual guest, and if we could not get another one we would not take five dollars for it; in fact money would hardly buy it. God bless and prosper THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the good work.

The Stars That Point to Christ

On my return to the city, I found an express package awaiting me, which proved to be, on opening, a beautiful Red Letter Bible. I have shown it to friends, and they remark what I said, at first glance: "What clear type! How easy to read!" The red print is at first a surprise, and then it is a pleasure to note, in turning over the Old Testament, the stars which guide, like that at Bethlehem, to the Christ; and one feels as if he had met a particular friend, as he comes across a reverse or passage here and there.

Our Art Portfolio in China

We take great pleasure in acknowledging your very kind favor in sending us the "Art Portfolio" which was received yesterday. It was a great surprise to us, and we are more than delighted. In this land, where pictures are so few, we more than ever appreciate your beautiful premium, and thank you most cordially. We shall also take pains to show the other missionaries, and we should think all would be glad to avail themselves of this marvelous offer.

YEARS OF PRAYER

Fulton Street Prayer Meeting Celebrates its Forty-fifth Anniversary

IN the old chapel at 113 Fulton street, New York, an interesting meeting was held on Tuesday, September 23, to celebrate the forty-fifth anniversary of the beginning of the famous noonday prayer meeting, the echoes of which have been heard in every land. Many representative business men were present, with others who have known and proved the value of this wonderful meeting. It was a deeply significant celebration. Since that memorable day in 1857, when Mr. J. C. Lanphier sat solitary in the little room waiting for believers to come and join him in communion with God, a meeting has been held there every noon except on Sundays. Bankers, brokers, lawyers and business men of all trades have been present and have taken part in the exercises. Letters have come from every section of our own land, and from almost every other country, begging that prayers might be offered for the writers or their relatives and friends. Mr. Lanphier kept a record of these as long as he lived, and pointed with triumphant faith to the number of other letters from the same writers, asking that thanks be given to God for the blessings God had granted in answer to the prayers that had been offered at the meeting. There was good reason for believing, as he used to contend, that multitudes of others had been answered, but the writers, like the lepers whom Christ healed, failed to give thanks.

Mr. Lanphier has gone to his reward, but the meetings he inaugurated have been continued, and are now under the management of Mr. F. H. Jacobs, who at the recent birthday celebration testified to the blessings that are still being granted in answer to the petitions daily presented at the meetings.

Mr. Robert E. Speer presided at the anniversary meeting this year, and after Dr. P. S. Henson, of Brooklyn, had led the devotional exercises, he called on Rev. David James Burrell to give a sketch of the history of the meeting during the past forty-five years. Dr. Burrell related the facts which have already been published in this journal, and concluded with the following invocation:

"May the Spirit of God rest upon us today, as the dew of the morning; and wherever the story of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting is told, may a host of workers rise up to emulate this great example of earnest, persistent prayer and effort for the salvation of men."

Prof. W. W. White, Ph.D., the next speaker, said: "We all believe that God is Almighty, that he knows before we ask him what we need, and he is in sympathy with us; but his purpose would not be fulfilled if we did not ask him to grant our desire. God has appointed prayer as a means for the accomplishment of his will. 'Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you' is his promise. God is supreme. He can give or withhold. It does not all depend upon ourselves. His purpose and power is to develop the spiritual life of his child. Whatever brings us into line with the will of God will be answered prayer. When our prayers are not answered, we are not in God's order, as revealed in his Word.

Rev. Theodore S. Henderson, D.D., who followed, said: "We are glad to unite our prayers with yours, for the spread of Christ's kingdom in the earth. We are living in a rapid age, we walk twice as fast on Broadway to-day as twenty years ago. It seems more necessary to sometimes turn aside and get alone with God, and such meetings as are held here daily affords the opportunity, and many testify that here God has met them and blessed them. This is 'a Spiritual Clearing House,' a noon-day prayer meeting for inspiration and intercession for others. May God ordain us to this blessed ministry of intercession."

At the close of this address, Fraternal Greetings from John Street Noon-Day Meeting, were given by Mr. Hugh R. Monroe, followed by Mr. J. B. Maxfield of the West Side Prayer Meeting.

The following hymn, composed expressly for the occasion by Roger H. Lyon, was sung, and concluded the exercises:

Dear "Upper Room"—blest refuge, where,
At each mid-day, these years,
The heart hath bowed in humble prayer,
And shed its many tears.

What troubled souls have here found peace;
What sadness changed to joy;
What doubts dispelled through Faith's increase,
Hopes gained, none can destroy!

From me and far have come appeals
To lift here prayers for aid;
How oft the answer swift reveals
The prayer not vainly made!

Thou burdened one—Come in and pray;
Here tell Him all thy woes—
How'er oppressed, He'll lead the way,
Rich blessings to bestow.

NOTHING LESS AND NOTHING MORE

FATHER in heaven, I ask of thee
To grant from thy full treasure-store
Just what thou seest my need to be,
And nothing less and nothing more;
Yea, all thou wilt, bestow on me—
Nothing less and nothing more.

The blessing thou art pleased to give
To those who love thee and adore,
With grateful heart I would receive;
I ask no less and want no more—
Just help a perfect life to live—
Nothing less and nothing more.

Let me have thee, and thee alone,
Though old and homeless, frail and poor,
And in thy Book my name be known,
I cannot ask or wish for more;
My name among the Saviour's own—
Nothing less and nothing more.

I hear thy voice. Come in, I pray;
My heart unlocks its every door;
Have in my house, O Lord, thy way
Forevermore, forevermore,
Thy way with me, Lord, every day,
Nothing less and nothing more.

With thee my soul can sweetly rest
In sunshine, or when tempests roar;
I know I'm safe with thee as Guest,
And I cannot ask or wish for more;
With thee I'm sure of what is best,
Nothing less and nothing more.

MISS HELEN'S EXPERIMENT

By E. H. PORTER

CHAPTER II.

Sally's Wonderland

WHEN nurse Susan had caught up Sally's hand and walked off through the park so hurriedly, Sally had said nothing; but she hugged the beautiful doll close to her fast-beating heart, and watched with pleased interest her own feet in the pretty, shiny shoes, trying to keep pace with the nurse's long strides.

Susan was badly frightened. She had not realized how time was flying all the while she was chatting so pleasantly with her adored Jimmy, and now it was very late—much later than her young charge was allowed to be in the park. She remembered with a throb of relief that her mistress was not at home. However, she was not the only one to blame—had not the child herself run away?

"Miss Helen, you're a naughty child to give nurse such a fright. What did you leave that tree for, and go and play with that dirty little girl?" No answer.

"Miss Helen, answer me."

"Still no reply."

"Very well, you can be sulky then, if you think that is a pretty way to behave," said nurse Susan, not in the least surprised, for it was quite common for the heiress of the Morton millions to take refuge in dignified silence whenever her temper was ruffled.

Susan hurried the child along, across the park, out the great gates, and down the avenue. By and by she turned abruptly and dragged the unresisting Sally up a broad flight of marble steps and into a great hall filled with wonderful things.

"There," said she, hurriedly taking off the child's hat, "run upstairs to the play-room, and Jane will bring up the dinner." Then she disappeared behind a beautiful curtain, leaving Sally alone.

"Upstairs to the play-room," murmured Sally to herself. "Dinner! that sounds good—but what is it?" taking a step forward and peering into the great drawing-rooms. "Golly! Ain't this bang up!" she exclaimed in subdued ecstasy, turning round and round that nothing might be lost. Then she spied the great stairway. "Gee! I'm goin' t' try fur it, anyhow—here goes!" and up the broad steps she pattered until she reached the hall.

Doors, doors, everywhere; some shut—some open. Sally tiptoed along, her little feet sinking happily into the soft velvet carpets. Cautiously and stealthily she peeped into every room, but found nothing illustrating her idea of a play-room until she had gone far down the hall. There she found a door wide open. In a trice she was inside the room, and on her knees in rapt devotion before a row of gorgeous dolls, each treasure seeming to her ecstatic gaze more altogether lovely than the others.

Susan found her there when she and Jane came in a little later. For a few minutes the two women busied themselves about a table at the far side of the long room, and the tinkle of china and silver came to Sally's ears, and an enticing odor of food to her nostrils.

"There, Miss Helen, come, it's ready," announced Susan crisply. "I'll warrant you can eat—if you can't talk," she added under her breath; then her tone changed to one of amazement as Sally came forward into the light.

"For heaven's sake, child—what a dirty face and hands! That's what you get by playing with nasty little beggars. Come here at once," and she led Sally into the bath-room and subjected the offending face and hands to a vigorous scrubbing. "There, run and eat your dinner."

Sally needed no second bidding. The two maids left the room just as she commenced to eat. When they returned, six minutes later, every vestige of food had disappeared save an infinitesimal portion on the way to Sally's mouth.

"Miss Helen!" exclaimed Susan in dismay, the minute she opened the door. "What are you doing with that knife in your mouth? And where is your napkin?" she continued, as she advanced into the room. "Why, child, have you forgotten all your manners?" Then she turned to Jane in bewilderment.

"Jane, that midget has eaten every blessed thing on the table," she exclaimed.

At her first words, Sally had dropped the knife with a clatter. In a moment she had pushed back her chair and returned to the dolls in the corner. Susan looked after her with a growing fear in her eyes.

"Jane," said she in a low voice, "something's the matter. That child doesn't act like herself. She's sick."

Jane sniffed.

"Sick—and eat such a dinner? Pooh!"

"Well, something ails her. I'm going to put her to bed, anyway," and she followed Sally, and spoke to her with a kindness born of a nameless terror.

"Come, dear, please come. Nurse wants you to come with her," said she gently, surprised, but relieved, at the child's ready obedience.

Down the hall a little ways, Susan pushed open a door. Sally found herself in a fairy-like room, which was furnished all in dainty blue and white, and contained a wonderful lace-draped bed. Then she felt Susan's fingers working busily at the fastenings of her borrowed dress. A moment later the woman's piercing scream ran through the house, and brought Jane to the door with a white, scared face.

The forlorn figure of the child, clad in dirty, ragged, and scanty undergarments, stood in defiant aggressiveness in the middle of the floor, while poor Susan, with bulging eyes, gazed in horrified fascination at the singular transformation of Helen's dainty, lace-trimmed linen into the miserable garments before her.

Jane uttered a cry of terror, then strode into the room and peered into Sally's face. The child bore the scrutiny with stolid indifference.

"Susan—it isn't Miss Helen at all!" screamed Jane, in horror.

"What? O dear—O dear! I knew it—I knew it! What shall I do?" moaned Susan, rocking violently back and forth, her apron over her head; then she stopped suddenly, and grasped the arm of the child with no gentle touch.

"Quick—who are you? You bad, naughty girl! Where's our own little Helen? You are not our Miss Helen!"

"I didn't say I was."

"Well, who are you?"

"Sally Perkins."

"But, where's Miss Helen?"

"Down t' my house."

"Down to your house! Where's that? Here—put on your dress and we'll go right after her, quick! How came you by this dress, anyway? It's Miss Helen's! What do you mean by such actions?" The words followed each other in a swift torrent from Susan's lips, but in attempting to put the dress over Sally's head, the nurse met with unexpected resistance.

"I ain't goin'." I'm here to take her place fur a few days," said Sally, airily, trying vainly to imitate the nonchalance of her young teacher, who had spoken these same words a short time before.

"To take her place!" said Susan, stupidly.

"Yeah; she's got all the good things, an' I hain't got none. We've swapped places fur awhile, so's I c'n have some."

For a moment the two women were stupefied at the child's audacity. Susan was the first to recover. It was with no gentle hand that she tried again to put on the child's dress.

"Swapped places, indeed! We'll see about that! Here, put on your duds at once, and we'll go after Miss Helen straightway."

"I won't tell ye whar I live!" said the small girl, with a shrewd glance.

"Won't? Well, I reckon you will. I guess whipping will make you tell."

The child threw back her head and laughed shrilly.

"Aw right—try it. I ain't 'fraid o' that—I'm used t' it!" said she, by a quick movement baring her shoulders and back to show the red ridges and purple blotches of recent blows.

The women shuddered involuntarily, and Susan's voice was almost gentle when she spoke.

"See here, little girl, we don't want to hurt you, but we must have our Miss Helen back to-night. Come, tell us where you live, and we'll give you something nice."

COLONY LIFE.

Effect of Climate Overcome by Proper Food.

The necessity of pleasant, nutritive and proper food is highly appreciated in the Philippines, particularly by Americans unused to climate and native custom in cooking.

One of our soldier boys writes:—"In this land of bad food and disordered stomachs, a nearly fatal attack of malaria left my digestion for many months in such a state, that food of any kind distressed me terribly. I suffered from the effects of drugs, but dared not eat. It was simply misery to live. The so-called remedies only seemed to aggravate my sufferings.

Some friend suggested Grape-Nuts Food, and I gave it a trial. To my surprise and pleasure, it did all and more than was claimed for it. I am now, after using the food for 18 months, in good health; my digestive apparatus in perfect order, and I have long lost all feeling of pain or discomfort after eating. In fact, I live again. I would not be without Grape-Nuts for the world. ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

Cost No More than Plain Ones in

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Over $75,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

"Don't want it—had 'nuf fur supper," said Sally, indifferently, her eyes wandering in mild curiosity around the room.

Susan's heart sank. This was indeed a most impossible child.

"But we must have Miss Helen; her mamma is coming home, and she'll want her little girl," ventured Susan, in an attempt to reach the possible heart of this obdurate young person.

Sally grew impatient.

"See here, her ma's comin' back Sat'day, ain't she?"

Susan nodded in dumb surprise.

"Well, Helen said how I could have her good times 'til then, an' I'm goin' to. I shan't tell ye whar I live 'til Sat'day mornin', then I'll take ye there, an' ye c'n bring Helen back. She said she'd come back when her ma did, an' swap back agin—so there!"

Clearly there was nothing else to be for once, anyway!" declared Susan, grimly.

Half an hour later, Sally, in a dainty white nightgown, with six dolls hugged to her doll-hungry heart, sank into the soft depths of that wonderful lace-draped bed.

The next day was a dream of bliss to Sally, but it more nearly resembled a nightmare to poor Susan and Jane. The child early discovered that the two women wished to keep her identity a secret, and she shrewdly suspected the reason; therefore, she ruled the two frightened maids with a rod of iron, from morning till night. She insisted on doing everything that Helen would have done, even to driving in the park behind the pompous coachman; and she reveled all day in toys and dolls and good things to eat.

Early Saturday morning, Sally, clothed in clean, half-worn garments of Helen's, started for the little brown house. When just in sight of the shanty, the little girl lone. It would be but a day and two nights, anyway, for it was now Thursday evening. The two frightened women were utterly powerless in the hands of this small, but obstinate piece of humanity. The only way they could hope to retain their positions in the family service was to keep the whole thing a secret. If it ever reached the madam's ears, they knew but too well what would be the consequences. But it was with a heart filled with bitter resentment that Susan finally succumbed, and proceeded with her task of disrobing the child.

She handled the pitifully forlorn garments gingerly, and gave them to Jane as soon as possible, with the short order, burn 'em up," then she led the way into the sumptuously appointed bath-room adjoining Miss Helen's bedchamber. The tub of warm water filled Sally with dismay.

"I'll be drowned!" she screamed, as Susan pushed her struggling arms and legs under water.

"No, you won't; but you'll be clean—darted ahead, and rushed into the house to emerge, a moment later, leading a very white, tired-looking Helen by the hand.

With a cry of joy, Susan clasped the child in her arms, then hastily throwing over Helen's shoulders a cape, which she had brought to hide the calico dress; caught her hand and hurried her away.

"I've had a awful good time," called Sally after them. "I hope yer'll wanten swap agin, sometime!"

Nurse tightened her clasp and hurried faster. It was not until they were almost home that she spoke, and then her voice trembled with feeling.

"Miss Helen, dear, I suppose you did not mean any harm, but you've given me a terrible fright. If—if you tell mamma whar you've been, nurse will be sent away," she finished wistfully.

"I shall not tell mamma yet awhile," said Helen, wearily. "but nurse, I am so hungry. Can't I have luncheon right away?"

"You blessed lamb!" murmured Susan, and from that moment devoted herself so

assiduously to her young charge, that by night, when papa and mamma came, the little girl was her own bright self again.

The next day was Sunday. Helen, arrayed in spotless white, entered her Sunday School class with a sweetly serious face, and took her seat by the teacher. She did not always listen very heedfully, but to-day something attracted her attention at the very first.

"Yes, we are all God's children," said the sweet-faced lady softly. "We are all brothers and sisters. Each one of you here is a sister to the others, and you should treat each other lovingly and unselfishly."

Helen looked up quickly. "Are all little girls my sisters?" "Yes, dear."

"Poor little girls, that wear old clothes, and don't have any good times?" she persisted.

"Yes—why, yes, dear," said the teacher, a little hesitatingly, as she saw the strained look on the young face. In a moment she had changed the subject—but Helen's thoughts had not.

All the way home the child pondered many things. Sally's lot in life was bad enough, anyway, when Sally was just another little girl that she knew; but if Sally was a sister, it was serious then, indeed. Clearly, it could not be right for one sister to have so much and another so little.

Sunday, Helen was allowed to eat dinner in the great dining-room with her father and mother, and it was always a dearly prized treat; but to-day she came to the table with a grave face. Her soup and fish were sent away untouched, and then she spoke.

"Mamma, please, I'd like a doughnut." "A what, my child?" "A doughnut."

"But, my dear, I can't let you have so silly a thing as that. Little girls should eat their dinner as it is set before them." "But, mamma, a doughnut is all that Sally has, and I don't think I ought to have any more than she has."

"My dear child, what can you mean? Who is Sally?"

"She is my sister, and she lives in a mean little house and doesn't have anything for her dinner but a doughnut, while I have all these nice things. It isn't fair," said Helen earnestly, with deeply flushing cheeks.

Mr. Morton raised his eyebrows, and glanced at his wife with a twinkle.

"My dear, do you happen to know of any socialistic community near here? Er—have you examined our daughter's reading matter, lately?"

"Oh, hush, dear," replied his wife, with a low laugh. "I can't imagine what the child means, but I'll try to find out after dinner." Then to her daughter, gently, "Eat your dinner now, darling. We will see what can be done for Sally by and by."

Visitors came after dinner, and the matter entirely slipped Mrs. Morton's mind. She was startlingly reminded of it, however, the next morning, when her young daughter appeared in the breakfast-room clad in an old, outgrown dress, with feet and ankles that were guiltless of covering.

"Why, Helen!" murmured the lady; "why are you wearing that dress, and where are your shoes and stockings?" "Mamma, I can't be wearing pretty things all day, when Sally hasn't any."

Mr. Morton glanced helplessly at his wife, then picked the little girl up and set her on his knee.

"Helen, dear, tell me what all this is about," said he gently.

"It's Sally Perkins, papa. She lives in a mean little house the other side of the park. Her mamma is horrid to her, and her papa gets drunk and strikes her, and she never has anything good. She is my sister, and I am not going to be happy unless she is." And two big tears rolled down the flushed cheeks and rivaled the flashing diamond on papa's finger.

"Helen," said Mr. Morton very gravely, "papa and mamma will go to see your little friend right away. We will put her in some school where she can have plenty to eat and wear, and where she will be happy all the day long. Now if we do that, will you go upstairs and put on your own pretty dress and shoes, and be our dear, precious, sunny little daughter once again, with no more teasing for doughnut dinners?"

Helen dimpled into radiant smiles, and kissed her father straight on the lips.

"You old darling—I'll go this very minute." And she rushed joyously from the room.

When she was gone, Mr. Morton drew a long breath and looked whimsically at his wife, who still sat in dumb amazement.

"My dear," he said, "for heaven's sake, keep that blessed child from knowing where her other forty or fifty thousand sisters of the same sort in this benighted city live."

A Missionary Drummer-Boy

"LAST September," writes Chaplain Munro, of the Tombs, New York, "I was greatly surprised to receive a letter from a drummer-boy in a British regiment stationed in Burmah. One sentence bound me to that lad, ten thousand miles away. It was: 'I may be a stranger to you, dear chaplain, but I am your friend in Jesus Christ.' Away off there in India, this boy, visiting the home of an American missionary, ran across an old copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing some account of my work, and then wrote me. A correspondence sprang up between us, and this is what I have learned about Alfred East, now in the service of King Edward. He is a Canadian. At eighteen, he was converted. Then he went to India as a Christian missionary. He did not know the language, and he had no means with which to secure special missionary training. He determined to go to India as he was, yet he did not know how he could accomplish this. A way opened for him to get to England, earning his passage-money by work aboardship. There a friend suggested: 'Enlist in the Army and go to the Punjab, so you can learn the language and customs of the people.' He has been in India since 1893, in the Punjab, and Burmah, where he now is, he has met a great many missionaries, and has made a large circle of friends among these servants of Jesus Christ.

"From them," he says, "I have received copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—that messenger of light from my own land." It was from New York he started for India; to New York he wants to return, and prepare himself by the necessary course of study and training to go back to India as a missionary of the Cross. 'I know the language and the people here now,' he says, 'and half the work is done. I am praying for the way to be opened for me to enter the Army of Christ.'

Musical Sunshine

Mrs. Joseph Fairchild Knapp, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the International Sunshine Society, has sent to headquarters 1,500 sheets of music. She composed the music for the verses, entitled, "The Value of a Smile," written by a Sunshine member, in Baltimore. Mrs. Knapp donates every penny received for this song to the International Sunshine Society. One verse runs:

There is no room for sadness when we see a cheery smile,
It always has the same good look, it's never out of style—
It naves us on to try again when failure makes us blue,
The dimples of encouragement are good for me and you,
Good for me and you, good for me and you, and you.

IN THE KANSAS CATTLE COUNTRY

I WAS much amused the other day, when coming out of a Sunday School in an out-of-the-way corner of Kansas, to see the children around my mules, grouped, as you see them in the accompanying photograph. Several years ago I passed through this neighborhood and organized a school, and the man who became superintendent had several boys who were especially interested in the mules, and could hardly wait until Sunday School was over to again renew the acquaintanceship.

In the picture, the mule Beersheba has rebelled from holding so many boys, and the little sister, who is awaiting her turn to ride, had to hold her head while I took the photograph. I have driven this team now about eleven years, and the mules know their business about as well as I do. Every night almost finds them in a strange pasture, and they do not have grain one-half the time. Whenever they see a group of children or a school-house, they always want to turn toward them and stop.

In the forenoon of the day mentioned I visited a little school having a lady superintendent. The school-house was in the centre of the section and surrounded by a pasture, as we were in a cattle country. The school had a full attendance, and supplied a large section of country with about all the spiritual instruction that they received. I noted a German family or two in the school trying to learn the English language, and I supplied some of the children with English Bibles. In the evening I spoke to a house full of young people.

I love to work with the young people, and whenever I can I gather them into a meeting. One night a few weeks ago, I drove up to Brother Goldworth's sod-house, a few hours before sunset; we had time to circulate word for a meeting at his place, and I was surprised to see a house full even before the commencement of the services. It was a moonlight night, and after the services the young people had a good time together.

Brother Goldworth is a farmer-preacher, and has seven appointments at the school-houses in his district. I have known him for many years as a very earnest and faithful Christian. In former years he was a very rough character, and now stands a wonderful example of God's Holy Spirit working through a man. He first superintended a school that I started, and has always been a very successful worker in leading souls to Christ. Like scores of other farmers, he moved farther west a few years ago, and secured land for a home of his own. I am seeing people almost every day that I am acquainted with, from my meeting them in the eastern part of the field. We have had a heavy wheat crop in some of the neighborhoods in which I have held meetings, and I have counted it a compliment to me that the people would come out to my week-night meetings when they were so busy. I have only lost three or four night meetings by harvesting and threshing during the summer.

The night meetings are held with little Union Sunday Schools. At a number of them I have placed small libraries of good books, and during the last three trips I have sold and distributed over one hundred Bibles. So many of these points do not have preaching that I organize Bible readings with a local leader, and often induce him to talk to them as best he can.

As usual I have much to do, and I am pleased to report that God is blessing my work. Pray for me as I enter into work this fall with a number of schools where I shall try and introduce preaching, and others where I shall help in meetings to establish the work more permanently.

THE PRESIDENT'S ILLNESS

He Submits to an Operation for a Slight Abscess—His Western Tour Interrupted

WHEN President Roosevelt was thrown from his carriage by the trolley collision at Pittsfield, Mass., on Sept. 2, last, it was known that he had been pretty badly shaken up, but the country generally, in its thankfulness at his escape from death, soon forgot about the possibility of minor injuries. In his fall at that time the President sustained several painful though not dangerous contusions. One of these, on the left leg, between the knee and the ankle, gave him constant pain, and ultimately developed into a small abscess. He bore the pain quietly, and even the President's closest official intimates knew nothing of what he was suffering.

When the President began his Western trip, the sore gave him increasing trouble. While it did not make him lame, it was apparent to some of his friends that he was not quite so lively or energetic upon his feet as usual. In addressing some of the great assemblages that greeted him, he would endeavor, as far as possible, to save the injured limb from undue strain; but in spite of his care, it grew steadily worse. A white swelling formed around the bruised portion, immediately over the shinbone, and the pain was incessant.

On the Presidential party reaching Indianapolis on Sept. 23, Dr. George A. Lung, President Roosevelt's physician, concluded that an operation would be necessary, to relieve the pain and restore the limb to a sound and healthy condition. Dr. George H. Oliver, Dr. George J. Cook and Dr. Henry Jamison, eminent Indianapolis physicians, were called in for consultation, and all agreed with Dr. Lung as to the advisability of an operation. President Roosevelt reluctantly consented, being sorry to disappoint the people in those places which he had promised to visit during his tour. It was represented to him that there was a possibility of blood poisoning, if the sore were longer neglected.

The operation was performed in room 52, St. Vincent's Hospital, Indianapolis, Dr. Oliver handling the instruments, under the supervision of Dr. Cook. Secretaries Root and Cortelyou were present, and also Drs. Lung, Jamison and Richardson. First a local anæsthetic was applied to the limb, then the swelling was relieved by the insertion of a needle, with a fine hole through its middle by which the fluid matter in the swelling was easily extracted. The President bore the operation without wincing, and according to one report, remarked jocosely while it was in progress, that "if the surgeons desired any expert information on the subject, he could inform them that something was happening in the vicinity of his shinbone."

When the sore was dressed, after the removal of the serum, several friends who had been anxiously waiting, were permitted to see the President. He again spoke regretfully of the disappointment at the interruption of his Western trip. He was placed on a litter and carried from the hospital to the train, which left a few minutes afterward for Washington.

Dr. Oliver, in a public statement made later, said the injury was not at all serious, and that all that was necessary for complete recovery was that the injured leg should not be used for the next eight or ten days, when normal conditions would be fully restored.

If you do not own a complete Shakespeare, or if you own a set and the Notes are not sufficiently full and clear, if there are no satisfactory Glossaries, no Critical Comments, or no helps to the study of the plays, send your address and six cents in stamps to pay mailing expenses, and we will forward you a handsomely printed booklet containing

- "How to Study Shakespeare"
- "Why Young Men Should Study Shakespeare"
- "Shakespeare, the Man"

The first is by Hamilton Wright Mabie, the eminent Shakespearian scholar. The second is by Prof. L. A. Sherman, of the University of Nebraska. The third is a brilliant and unique essay by Walter Bagehot. This alone is sold by other publishers at 50 cents a copy. With the booklet we will send a fine portrait of Shakespeare. These essays are of great value to both general readers and students of Shakespeare. We make this offer to enable us to give you some information regarding the best Shakespeare ever published, and it is made only to reliable men and women. WANDERERS Travel Thousands of Miles and Find It at Home.

We go about from one place to another in search of something we desire, without success, and finally find it right at home awaiting us. A mining engineer out in Mansfield, Mo. tells of his experience with coffee.

He says, "Up to the year 1898 I had always been accustomed to drinking coffee with my breakfast each morning. In the summer of that year I developed a severe case of nervous prostration and I took several courses of treatment for it in Toronto, Buffalo and New York City without obtaining any permanent benefit.

One of the most trying manifestations of the malady was a condition of nervous excitement in which I found myself every day during the forenoon. It never occurred to me to attribute this to coffee until I read an advertisement of yours last Fall describing a case similar to my own which had received benefit from the use of Postum Cereal Food Coffee. I at once changed my breakfast beverage from Java and Mocha to Postum and the effect was nothing short of marvelous. After using it less than a week I was free from morning attacks and in six months all my nervous symptoms had disappeared.

I have demonstrated the fact that by following your directions in making Postum Food Coffee any one can obtain as rich a cup of coffee from Postum as from any of the imported brands, and may rest assured that they will escape the injurious effects of coffee and experience much benefit from the use of Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

SELF - MASTERY*

The Scriptural Method of Acquiring Control of Physical Appetites and Passions

EVERY man who has aspired to live a higher life than that of a mere animal, has had to wrestle with the problem of self-mastery. Whether he has lived in a civilized or a savage community, whether he has been ignorant or educated, rich or poor, the same problem has confronted him. He has had to decide not only whether he will be the master or the slave of his physical appetites and propensities, but if he decides on subduing them, how he can achieve his purpose. It is hard work; there is no doubt of that, and it is remarkable that some of the most gifted human beings have failed in that task. It is grievous to look back over history and see how many conquerors have failed to master the enemies within them, how many teachers have failed to learn this lesson, how many leaders of men have followed their passions to their own destruction. Solomon, a conspicuous instance of the wise man, enslaved by his lust, recognized the intensity of the struggle, and admitted that "Greater is he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

The special subject associated with the topic is the mastery of the craving for intoxicants. This is not the only rebel in our nature that ought to be subdued, but it is rightly placed in the foreground, because its indulgence stimulates and reinforces all the others. Anger, lust, cupidity, and all the other propensities that degrade and destroy, are quickened and prompted by inebriety. It is true they are found in natures which have no desire for the cup, but it is also true that they are more rampant when the man drinks, and as they attack him when he is off his guard, they find the inebriate an easy victim. Among ourselves especially there is no more prolific source of crime, misery and ruin than this. The difficulty in the case of this particular rebel of strong drink is increased by its insidious method of attack. The victim does not realize that he is in the toils until his chains are too strong to be easily broken. A great writer presents the case in impressive form when he says, "You ought to abstain; if it will cost you but little effort, you should do it for the sake of others; if it will cost you a great effort, you should do it for your own sake." This is sound reasoning, for the man who cannot abstain without a struggle, is in serious danger of becoming a slave to the cup, and he cannot too soon deliver himself.

Many methods of acquiring self-mastery have been suggested, all of which have their value and are of use in various cases. That proposed by the Apostle Paul is, however, incomparably the best. Men needed help in his day as much as they do now, indeed, as will be seen from the graphic picture of the struggle he drew in Romans 7 he had himself fought the battle. He therefore speaks from experience when he gives advice. His remedy for all kinds of sin does not consist so much in repression as in an antidote. He urges his readers to "walk in the Spirit," and assures them that if they do so, they will not fulfil [or obey] the lusts of the flesh. This is precisely what we want to know. We do not want to be under this dominion, and this is the way to avoid it. What then is walking in the Spirit? It is the effort after holiness. It is the giving ourselves up to the mastery of the Holy Spirit. It is the taking of a new ideal of life. An illustration of the principle is that of a father concerned at finding his son spending his evenings away from home and frequenting questionable resorts. The wise father sacrifices his own evenings to save his son. He makes them so pleasant for the boy at home, by games, and books, and music, and amusements, that the boy has no longer a desire to go abroad for pleasure. He has better pleasures at home. So the Apostle presents to us this new ideal of life, this seeking after the delights of a holy life as a means of weaning us from the gratification of the lower instincts.

The Body Consecrated

The Common Fault of Forgetting God's Ownership of the Physical Nature

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THERE are many Christian people who do not think of praying to God about their bodies, who, when ill, will run for a doctor without consulting God first, as though their body did not belong to God, forgetting that it is not only the spirit and the soul which is bought with a price. "Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have from God? and ye are not your own, for ye were bought with a price; glorify God, therefore, in your body" (1 Cor. 6: 19, 20). It seems to me, that we are lacking a great deal of the power of the Holy Ghost by treating our spirits and souls as though they alone were the Lord's property, not seeing that our bodies also are "bought with a price"; and therefore, through lack of understanding this, we eat and we drink without thinking whether in so doing we are glorifying God. We consult whom we will, and we take what remedy we will, without asking God!

If we habitually ask God how we are to spend this day, and then, when sickness comes, we do not consult God, but man, are we not inconsistent? Ask him. He may tell you to take medicine. When Isaiah prescribed the poultice of figs, he did not say anything against it. There is not a word in Scripture either for or against human remedies. But what we have to do is to go first to God about everything, in spirit, soul and body: in family life, with the education of our children, with regard to our servants, and, most certainly, with regard to what touches our bodily health. And it seems to me if the Church at home took this position, we should have more power with the heathen in foreign lands: in other words, if we lived a life fully at the disposal of our God, in spirit, soul and body, the heathen would find it out.

The first thought of a heathen, whenever he is afflicted, is that he has done something wrong. According to their idea, it is often that they have not offered enough to their idols; they do not look upon their sickness as an accident, and it seems to me that we have great power over the heathen through this thing. They lean to superstition, it is true, but sometimes those who are led out of superstition to faith in the living God, have been more accustomed to bow down before One they think greater than themselves than even Christians, who are such reasoners. Thus, when the Philistines were smitten with suffering, and they wanted to get rid of the Ark of the Lord, they called for their priests and diviners, saying: "What shall we do with the Ark of the Lord? Tell us wherewith we shall send it to its place." And these heathen priests said, "If ye send away the Ark of the God of Israel, send it not empty; but in any wise return him a guilt offering, then ye shall be healed, and it shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you." They recognized the true God, and we do not!

When we face the question of physical suffering, we know, according to the Word of God, that sickness really began as the work of Satan; it came into the world after sin, and in consequence of sin; and that when Jesus was upon earth he healed all that were oppressed of the devil. On the other side we see, in the New Testament, that sickness was often sent by God as a discipline to Christians, but as a scourge to the ungodly; and sometimes it is not very easy to see whether it is the hand of the enemy or the hand of God. But we can ask him; it is very simple—we can ask him why he has permitted this. Before we send for a doctor, surely our first step—just as in bereavement, the loss of money, etc., etc.—surely our first step is to go to our heavenly Father and ask what he has to say; and then, if he tells us, "I have something to say to thee, my child," perhaps it is the spirit of hurry, or it may be the spirit of covetousness, causing overwork in order to make money, or the lack of prayer—then that which has been wrong must be set right. He may want us to spare him a few more hours in prayer, to study his Word more, to be more alive to win souls, and he has to lay his hand upon us to teach us fresh lessons.

Do not let us help the heathen to think, when they are ill, that it is a chance that has happened to them. O let us teach them that nothing happens by chance, but that God makes all things work together for good to them that love him. "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" Or, if the unconverted see Christians acting exactly as they do; if they see that our faith-life does not work in our bodies, where they know it touches us most closely—what must they think of us?

May the Lord teach us to be tender with the heathen conscience, and may we learn not to make exception in our love and in our trust; but that we seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, fully trusting that all other things will follow. O let God direct us as regards trusting him, and let us trust him in reverses and in everything else, putting ourselves wholly, unreservedly, into the hands of God, to whom we belong by right.

THE INTERNAL BATH

BY MEANS OF

"THE J. B. L. CASCADE TREATMENT"

GIVES

HEALTH, STRENGTH, VITALITY

The J. B. L. Cascade is the only appliance especially made for the successful practice of the Internal Bath. It is simple in construction, absolutely safe, invariably effective, and can be applied by any person. The fundamental principle of the internal bath and its appliance, the J. B. L. Cascade, is, roughly stated: Every disease arises from the retention of waste matter in the system. Nature's drainage being clogged. In the vast majority of cases the clogging is in the colon or large intestine. Positively the one harmless and efficient means of clearing away this waste is the internal bath given with the J. B. L. Cascade.

The statement of fact in the last sentence is deceptively simple, for there is no device or invention in medicine which, for far-reaching beneficence, for scope of usefulness to sick and well, surpasses the J. B. L. Cascade. There is room here merely to touch upon its field, the vastness of which may be suggested to you by pondering on the question: "If external cleanliness is essential to health, how much more important is internal cleanliness?"

The internal bath is a sovereign remedy for ninety-nine per cent of all diseases. Its action prevents and relieves Appendicitis, Biliousness, Dyspepsia, Typhoid and all Malarial Diseases, headaches, etc. The only treatment that gives immediate relief in cases of over-indulgence in eating or drinking. This wonderful treatment is in successful use by 200,000 people. It is endorsed and prescribed by eminent physicians. An abundance of letters from grateful people bear witness to its astonishing merit.

CONVINCING EVIDENCE

"The most perfect system of medical treatment that the wisdom of man has ever discovered."
REV. J. B. RICHARDSON.

"I still keep recommending the 'Cascade treatment' in my pastoral work. I consider it the greatest discovery of the last century, bringing Joy, Beauty, and Life to so many that had almost despaired of ever again feeling the touch of health in their bodies."
REV. W. L. STRANGE.

We want to send free to every person, sick or well, a simple statement setting forth this treatment. It contains matters which most interest every thinking person. If you live in New York you are earnestly invited to call, but if you cannot call, write for our pamphlet "The What, The Why, The Way," which will be sent free on application, together with our great special offer for this month only.

TYRRELL'S HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, Clerk 10 R, 1562 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

To All Who Suffer from SPINAL DEFORMITIES

85 per cent. cheaper than the old methods. 100 per cent. better. Weighs ounces where others weigh pounds. For Men, Women and Children; none too young, none too old to be relieved. We offer the only Scientific Appliance ever invented for the relief of this unsightly condition; relieved the inventor, Mr. P. B. Sheldon, of curvature of the spine of thirty years' standing.

Throw Away the Cumbersome and Costly Plaster-of-Paris and Sole-Leather Jackets

Our appliance is light in weight, durable, and conforms to the body as well to evidence that a support is worn. It is constructed on strictly scientific anatomical principles, and is truly a godsend to all sufferers from spinal troubles, male or female. We also make Scientific Appliances for protruding abdomen, weak back, stooping shoulders. Send for free booklet and letters from physicians, physical instructors, and those who know from experience of our wonderful appliances. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Write today for measurement blank. Don't wait.

One permanent, successful, and deformed spine, by the use of the Plaster-of-Paris Appliance. During the six months previous to procuring the appliance, I was unable to stand on my feet. After wearing it for six weeks, I could walk with the aid of crutches, and eight months later I was able to walk without them. I would do as much work as any able bodied man. My experience has convinced me that spinal trouble is the cause of many symptoms of disease, that can never be relieved by treating the symptoms, and nothing but some support to remove the weight of the head and shoulders from the spine will give relief. I cannot say too much for your Appliances; they are so light and comfortable (and can be removed so easily) that I cannot say too much for them. GEO. LIST

Mr. List writes the above after 6 years' experience with our appliance, the latter 2 years of which he has not worn any brace or support, PHILIP BURT MFG. CO., 30-10th St., JAMESTOWN, N.Y.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved

Without Medicine

Magic Foot Drafts will be sent to every sufferer in America on approval.

Send no money—we only ask your name—and we will send you, prepaid, a pair of the celebrated Magic Foot Drafts, which have benefitted thousands of the most unfortunate rheumatic sufferers in the world. If you are satisfied with the relief they give you then send us one dollar. If not don't send us a cent. We know there's comfort and happiness in every pair, and we want you to have them; that's why we are willing to take our pay after the work is done.

The drafts are worn on the soles of the feet because the circulatory and nervous systems are most easily reached at this point, but they relieve rheumatism in every part of the body by drawing out the poison from the system. A booklet on Rheumatism is sent free with the drafts—all without a cent in advance. Write to-day to Magic Foot Draft Co., 818 Oliver Building, Jackson, Mich.

I like to do business with hard-headed, cautious, conservative people.

They don't jump at the conclusion that because my advertisements read well, my System is necessarily all that I claim for it.

They avail themselves of the facilities I offer for investigation; for obtaining proof of the most convincing kind, and when convinced that my System is better than any other and infinitely superior to drugs and medicines for building and restoring perfect health, they place themselves in my hands with a confident belief in a successful issue—a hearty determination to second every effort I make in their behalf—that wins half the battle.

My System appeals to sensible people because it is a sensible system. No medicines or drugs, no apparatus, no doctor's bills, no time away from home or work, but just a systematic, natural development of every faculty, every organ, every function, 'till Nature's normal standard is reached.

I turn ill health into vigor, weakness into strength, lassitude into energy and mental dullness into life and activity.

My system if followed intelligently and faithfully relieves the system of poisons and impurities by producing healthy digestion and assimilation; relieves constipation, revitalizes the exhausted nerves; sends rich, red blood tingling to every extremity; puts sound muscle where muscle is needed; removes fat; gives erectness of carriage and springiness and grace to the walk; stimulates and builds up the tired brain; paints the cheek with the flush of robust health; builds up under-developed and undeveloped parts, and in fact, fits man, woman or child, to nature's perfect mold.

I can do all this for you as I have done for hundreds—yes, thousands of others, because my System is Nature's system—these results are as natural and inevitable as the cycle of the planets.

I have no book, no chart, no apparatus whatever. My System is for each individual; my instructions for you would be just as personal as if you were my only pupil. It is taught by mail only and with perfect success, requires but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

Nothing I can say in proof of all this is one-half so convincing as the unprejudiced testimony of men and women who have nothing to gain, everything to lose by deception, whose reputations are beyond the shadow of suspicion.

If you will send me your name and address I shall be pleased to mail you free, valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, and will not only send you testimonial letters from pupils, but I will also pay the postage both for inquiry and reply so that you will not be at a cent of expense to convince yourself that the Swoboda System is a successful system.

ALOIS P. SWOBODA, ESQ., Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir:—I began taking your physical exercises about four months ago and the benefit I have received from them is simply wonderful. I can truthfully say that I am a new man in every respect, due entirely to carrying out systematically the various exercises you from time to time sent me. When I commenced your exercises my muscles were flabby and the least exercise tired me; I was also a sufferer from constipation, but both have entirely disappeared and my muscles to-day are as hard as steel and I can take exercise which was before entirely beyond me. I would specially recommend all office workers to take a course of your physical exercises and I can quite readily say that they will find that the investment will bring them in grand returns. I intend keeping them up and from time to time will acquaint you with my progress. You are at liberty to refer anyone to me and I will be pleased to write them of the great benefit I have received from your treatment, of which I can only speak in the highest terms. Believe me, Very truly yours,

W. H. A. FRASER,

MR. ALOIS P. SWOBODA, Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir:—After having taken your course of exercise for three months, I feel that I have given it a thorough trial and am frank in saying that it has benefitted me more than I expected. Inasmuch as my duties as manager of a lumber manufacturing plant give me a great opportunity for exercise, I did not look for any decided increase in my measurements, but your exercises have hardened my muscles, regulated my general physical condition and made it possible for me to keep in good health without taking calomel and quinine. I feel sure that your system is the simplest one for a person who wishes to take regular exercise and I wish you the success you deserve with it.

Very truly,

Christian Herald Premiums for 1902-3

PROGRESS is the watchword of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to that end it bends its every energy. With each successive year, it faithfully strives, both in the character of its contents and the quality of its premiums, to excel in the most marked degree its previous best efforts, and the marvelous improvements already abundantly in evidence, are but the forerunners of far better things yet to come.

Although 1902 is not a leap year according to the calendar, it is, nevertheless, a leap year in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We have never before attained to so large a subscription list, never before made so good, helpful and readable a paper, never before succeeded in arranging so excellent a programme for the year to come, and never before devised or prepared such attractive premiums as those briefly described below. In a future issue these premiums will be illustrated in actual colors, accurately picturing to the eye the surprises which we have in store for one and all. The table is generously spread, and the members of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD family will have no cause to complain of the quality, the quantity, or the variety provided for them by the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

First among the superb surprises which we have in store for our subscribers this season, we would mention the grandest, the most beautiful, most serviceable, and most valuable gift ever offered by any paper, and which aggregates 1,000 square inches of the choicest reproductions of ten of the world's greatest masterpieces, in their original colors. We have spent over four months in conscientious, careful, painstaking work to produce the best results ever attained, and we know that we have succeeded far beyond our most sanguine expectations. Every one of these superb pictures will make a splendid Christmas Gift.

We have made unusual preparations to meet the demand, as we feel quite sure that everybody who sees these pictures will want them. The New York Metropolitan Museum of Art places the value of the originals of Schenck's Lost Sheep, Rosa Bonheur's Horse Fair and Schreyer's Arab Warriors, all three of which titles are among these reproductions at $86,000. The ten pictures, in beautiful colors and canvas finish, go free, all charges prepaid, as long as the supply may last, with every subscription, whether new or renewal, whether with or without Premium.

Then comes the most popular edition of the Holy Writ now in use,

Our Red Letter Bible

This edition of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, self-pronouncing, and printed entirely in black except as follows:

In the New Testament, all the words uttered by our Lord are printed in red.

In the Old Testament, every incident or passage referred to or quoted by our Lord, is printed in red, and every verse generally accepted as prophetic of Christ, is designated by a red star.

In the reference column of the Old Testament, all references to our Lord's words in the New Testament are printed in red.

The Red Letter Bible is set in large type, richly bound in American Levant with overlapping edges, silk sewed, and red under gold.

It contains the Concordance, subject-index, persons, places and things, gazetteer and Dictionary, all under one alphabetical arrangement, together with helps and maps. Also a list of the most important changes contained in the Revised Version.

This, the only Red Letter Bible in the world, Divinity Circuit, silk sewed, with movable Book Mark Index, with The Christian Herald, the brightest and best family paper in the world, for one year—every Wednesday—52 times—together for only $3.

Our Book-Mark Index, which is affixed to every Red Letter Bible, is made of Celluloid, attached to purple ribbon, and contains, in alphabetical arrangement, all the Books of the Bible, thus enabling anyone to instantly find the particular Book wanted. It is the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Next, of course, comes our superbly bound, large type

Red Letter New Testament

IN EITHER ENGLISH OR GERMAN

Nothing like this book has ever before been produced. The arrangement originated with Dr. Louis Klopsch, Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who spent four months in its careful preparation. It is absolutely free from typographical imperfections of any kind, and is in the highest sense of the word a Veritable Gem. The type is very large and very clear, and every word recorded as having been spoken by our Lord is printed in Red. For real convenience, legibility and serviceableness, it is unsurpassed.

It is beautifully bound in American Levant, soft and flexible, with overlapping edges, red under gold, and the only Testament containing our Saviour's words in red. Wherever a Testament can be utilized, this Book will be found more acceptable than any other.

For Home Reading, for pocket use, for church and Sunday School work, it is the ideal Testament.

This Testament will be sent, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, on receipt of only $1.85.

The Red Letter New Testament cannot be procured elsewhere. It is fully protected by copyright, and is the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

And then, we would direct your attention to the illustrated story of

The Hall of Fame

Dr. Louis Albert Banks' Latest and Greatest Work

Here is a magnificent volume of information, inspiration and edification, brimful of Patriotism and Romance, and splendidly illustrated.

DR. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

The ancients told the story of their great ones in marble and song; but this is the imperishable story of Columbia's greatest sons—a story that will fascinate young and old, inspiring the former to high and noble aims and patriotic lives, and gladdening the aged by the recognition at last accorded to our nation's Immortals.

The Book contains photographs of the ever memorable Dedication Scenes, Portraits and lives of the Elect, and of all who came within twenty votes of election; together with a carefully prepared list of Notable American Women entitled to the same high distinction which has been accorded the Elect.

Every page has an artistic illuminated border. The pictures of the majority of the 100 judges appointed are also included in this superb production, which contains over 400 large pages in bold, clear type, printed on featherweight paper, with numerous inserts, and bound in the highest style of modern bookmaking. A beautiful and very substantial Christmas gift.

The volume measures, when open, 9x15 inches, and is sent, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the queen of American weeklies, from date of your subscription for one whole year, on receipt of only $2.00. Read this wonderful book.

Inspired by its story, your own name may yet be inscribed on one of the vacant tablets in the Hall of Fame.

And finally comes Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart's latest work, entitled:

The Speaking Oak

And 300 Other Tales of Life, Love and Adventure, one of the comparatively few works destined to please and fascinate, to instruct and elevate.

Rich beyond measure, with a wealth of original anecdotes, humorous and pathetic, but always bright and sparkling, it will be read and re-read with increasing interest until its pages are thumb-worn, and its contents indelibly impressed on the minds of its countless enthusiastic readers.

DR. F. C. IGLEHART

Eleven original stories of Lincoln—never before published—new stories of "Stonewall" Jackson, Washington Irving, General Grant, Presidents Harrison, Cleveland, McKinley and Roosevelt, and hundreds of other anecdotes, sentimental, pathetic, humorous, moral and religious, make this volume a treasure rich beyond compare for family reading, and unusually helpful to orators, essayists, preachers, and Christian workers the world over.

Containing 400 large pages, printed on featherweight paper (to facilitate the convenient handling of the book), with numerous beautifully illustrated inserts on fine plate paper, all substantially bound in high grade cloth, with artistic side and back stamp this volume will be welcomed by thousands of families who appreciate excellent reading, presented in the most approved style of modern artistic bookmaking.

Sent, all charges prepaid, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the queen of American weeklies, for one whole year, 52 times, on receipt of only two dollars.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOR 1903

As for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD itself, we will simply add that the brightest stars in the literary world, and the ablest artists of national and international repute, have been engaged to contribute regularly to its interesting pages, and the exceptionally high grade and generous variety of its contents, both secular and religious, during the next twelve months, will enable it to successfully maintain the conspicuous place it now occupies in the very forefront of progressive family journalism.

There are papers for women and papers for men, papers for young folks and papers for children, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the one paper for all, beloved by all, read by all, and eagerly watched for by every member of every family of every home it enters. It is read in the parlor, read in the kitchen, read in the workshop, read at home, and read abroad. Already its circulation is nearly a quarter of a million copies each and every week, and wherever you find it you may know that intelligence, culture and refinement abide in that particular home. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is unique, in that no other paper can take its place in a family that once has become accustomed to its bright, interesting, optimistic and edifying pages. The subscription price as heretofore, including our Family Art Gallery, remains at $1.50 a year.

Renew early, and thus make sure of the very premium you may prefer.

THE EXCITED CROWDS SURROUNDING PIGGOTT, AS HE LEFT THE CHURCH AFTER HIS IMPIOUS UTTERANCES

THE "FALSE CHRIST" IN LONDON

"For many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many"—Mark 13: 6

ADVICES from London indicate that the career of the fanatical preacher, J. H. Smyth Piggott, who blasphemously announced himself as "the Son of God returned to earth," is already drawing to a close. Piggott, whose claim to be the Messiah was referred to in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD two weeks ago, has been the pastor of a sect of religious visionaries known as the Agapemone, since 1887, with a church at Clapham, North London. On several occasions in late years, his pulpit utterances have given rise to remark, but none of his vagaries attracted special attention until, during the service on Sunday, September 7, he announced to his congregation that "he was the Messiah."

A London paper, The Sphere, thus describes the scene in Piggott's church:

The police were unable to keep the people quiet. Mr. Piggott's carriage was attended by a posse of police, and the crowd hissed him vigorously. His only response was to remove his hat and stare steadily at his critics. The church was crammed. Mr. Piggott, in the course of the sermon, said, "Before Christ first came a man was sent to prepare his path. His name was John. . . . For the Second Coming there was a man sent from God whose name was Brother Prince. Those who received his message were very few. . . . It is not as pastor of this church that I stand before you, but as him who has come again as the Son of God, come in my own body, come to please my people, come to receive my people to myself."

Seldom has such a fury of excitement been aroused in London as that which burst over the head of the impious pretender. There were some who charitably regarded Piggott as sick or delirious; others held that he was insane, and that his utterances were the result of a diseased brain. But the illusion was dispelled on the following Sunday (Sept. 14), when his church was besieged by a curious multitude. Piggott repeated his sacrilegious announcement. He was greeted with loud, denunciatory outcries. When he finished, he was guarded by police until he entered his carriage, and even then such was the intense feel seemed to be in danger. "At the mere one observer, "thousands would quickly bodily vengeance on the false Christ," demonstrated the reverent feeling of the name of the Saviour as their quick re ing sin in appropriating to himself the Jesus. PESTILENT PROFANITY

TEXT, Ex. 20: 7:

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain"

THE blasphemer's condemnation is a mighty theme. Its curse indirectly affects the whole human race. Every man belongs to one of two classes: either he is a blasphemer, and therefore, on account of his profanity, comes directly under the condemnation of God; or else he belongs to that large class whose ears are polluted by his profane utterances, in which class are some who listen with indifference or contempt, while others shudder with horror as they hear the blasphemous mention of the name of their Master and King.

No street car or factory or shop or camp is entirely free from this shocking plague. In our streets and public resorts, there is daily and hourly evidence of the prevalence of this pernicious habit. Not only does the husband and father swear, but his example is sometimes followed by his wife and his son, and even his little children. Motormen swear at the trucks. Engineers swear at their fires. Boys swear at their lessons in the school-room and at their baseball bats upon the playground. Merchants swear at their clerks. Employees, under their breath in the store and out loud when they are away from the counters, swear at their employers. Men swear when they are buying goods. Fishermen swear at their hooks and lines, and at the fish they do not catch. Commercial travelers swear because the train or the hotel meal is late, or because there is no water-pitcher in the bedroom. Sailors swear at the ropes and the winds. Farmers swear at the cattle, and the grain and the weather. Men swear at the gutter into which they tumble and at the wagon wheel which spatters them with mud. Blasphemers swear when they are happy; they swear when they are sad. They swear at everybody and everything. The peculiarity of this habit of profanity is that it so permeates the blasphemer's mind and conversation that he gets to swear unconsciously. He can swear automatically in the same way that the lungs can breathe automatically, or a child's eyelids can open and shut automatically, or as a speaker, when he is thinking and planning out an address, can walk up and down his study automatically. It is about time that Christian pulpits should utter their protest against the universal evil of sacrilegious imprecation.

A Cruel Habit

Profanity is a cruel and a cowardly habit, because it shocks the holiest feelings and pierces the hearts of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Christians who are unable by law to stop this awful and blood-curdling infamy. Only the other day, a telephone girl had a Chicago merchant arrested, and fined $20 and costs in the Police Justice Court, because the defendant swore at her over the wires. His defense before the Justice was that he was hungry and wanted to order his dinner from a neighboring restaurant, and that the girl in the central office of the Telephone Company would not give him the right connection. But when the Justice heard the young girl's statement, that she could not make the necessary connection because the lines were busy at that time, he decided against the defense of the Chicago merchant. He said: "No man has a right to hurl profane words at any public servant, when that man or woman is trying to do his or her full duty." But Christian people cannot as a class stop the profane remarks which they hear every day from the passers-by upon the different public thoroughfares, as did the Chicago telephone girl. They cannot do it by law, because, as a rule, the profane oaths which so cruelly cut and lacerate their feelings are not addressed to them, but to others, with whom they are unacquainted.

The blasphemer is essentially a coward, because he inflicts suffering on persons who are powerless to resist or retaliate. It is a hard word, but I use the plain, unvarnished Anglo-Saxon word which describes the cowardly act. I want you swearers to realize the extent of the injuries which you are doing against some of your fellow-men when you swear in public. I want you to fully realize how you are cutting and lacerating Christian hearts with your blood-curdling oaths, by trying to put yourself, if possible, in your Christian brother's place, who is compelled to listen every day to the public utterances of profanity. You can judge, perhaps, how your Christian neighbor feels, by supposing that some one is speaking slightly and disrespectfully and slanderously of some one you very dearly love. You have a mother, or a wife, or perhaps, to use a better illustration, a young daughter whom you fondly cherish. Suppose, in some public place, you should hear her name vilified? What would you do? Why need you answer? Even now, I can see your cheek flush and your teeth become set and your hands clench together. You would immediately demand an apology from the vilifier, or perhaps, if you are an impulsive man, you would raise your fist and knock that man down. You would do just what a friend of mine did some years ago in Waynesburg, West Virginia. He was bringing home the dead body of his little girl, who was his idol. As a great, rough, brutal porter took the coffin out of the baggage-car, he, the father, said to him: "Man, please be careful. Don't handle that box roughly." But when the porter, in spite of that plea, swore at the coffin, and used a contemptuous epithet about the beloved form within it, and roughly let the box tumble upon the depot, as an average expressman lets a trunk fall to the ground, my friend doubled up his fist and knocked that porter clear into the tracks. He hit him so hard, that the policeman who ran up, at first thought him dead. But though the policeman was about to arrest the suffering father, he did not; for when he heard how the porter had sworn at the body of the dead child, he turned and said: "Brother, if that brutal porter comes to, hit him again a little harder than you hit him before, and I will stand by, and, if necessary, help you." That spirit which my friend showed towards the porter, who swore at his little girl's body, you, oh blasphemer, would show towards any one who would insult the fair name of a pure, noble daughter, whom you devotedly loved!

Causes Poignant Suffering

Now, my sinful brother, you who are addicted to the habit of swearing in public, did you ever stop to think that, nearly always, there are Christian men and women around you who love the name of Jesus Christ more than they love their father or mother or wife or daughter, or you love your child? Did you ever stop to think that by your profanity you are dishonoring the name of that Christ for whom those men and women, if necessary, would be willing to die? Have you a right to insult their Christ's name any more than they have a right to insult your child? Oh, my blaspheming brother, I called you a cruel coward. I take it all back. I take that statement back, because you may have sinned thoughtlessly. I cannot believe that you have deliberately intended to do this cruel thing. In the past, you have not realized the enormity of the injustice which, by the public habit of profanity, you are doing against some of your fellow-men. You are so kindhearted, you would not hurt a dog or a cat. Surely, after this, you will cease to use blasphemous words in public, and not further cut and lash into the bleeding hearts of your Christian brothers and sisters with the sharp, merciless impiety which has heretofore proceeded from your profane lips.

Profanity is not only a cruel, but also a very foolish habit. My profane brother, can you cite me one instance in all your life when the indulgence in the habit of swearing helped you in the least? Did the stone over which you stumbled get out of your way and apologize to you because you cursed it? Did the winds ever abate when you were crossing the seas because you blasphemed them? Did your employees ever love you better or work for you harder because you lost your temper and hurled at them a whole tornado of oaths? Did your horse ever drive better because you swore at him until you were red in the face? Did the blood stop flowing when you cut your finger merely because you made the air sulphurous with your denunciatory imprecations? "No!" you answer. "I cannot think of one good result that ever came from the evil habit of profanity. It is such a foolish habit that I sometimes wonder why God does not let the sticks and the stones and the dumb brutes have power of speech to rebuke me, as he once bade the long-eared beast of burden open his mouth and speak to the quick-tempered and unreasonable prophet of old. I ought to have better sense."

A Useless Profanation

And yet this evil habit of profanity would be absolutely ridiculous and ludicrous if it were not so heinous in its results. We have read how one of the kings of old, in order to prove that he was master of the seas as well as of the lands, ordered his soldiers to come down to the seashore, and with whips lash the waves as they tumbled upon the beach. And when we read of that royal order, we have laughed at the king's actions as those of a madman and of an egotistic, crack-brained person. Wherever we have noted the imbecile act of an unbalanced mind, we have compared it to the insane ambitions of the hero of the celebrated Spanish romance which Cervantes wrote. But were the picture of a king fighting the waves with whips and lashes, or the escapades of a Don Quixote ever more ridiculous and imbecile than the act of a great, big, strong man cursing a stone merely because his toe stubbed against it, or swearing at the axle merely because the grease ran dry, or blaspheming the iron head of a hammer merely because he, as a carpenter, was clumsy-fingered and hit the end of his thumb instead of the nail in the plank? Was ever a sight more ridiculous, if there was not eternal misery in its outcome, than a man standing at the gate of an elevated depot cursing the train, and wishing that its platform wheels and glass windows and wooden seats might be consumed in the fires of an inferno, merely because he was too lazy to get up in time for breakfast, to catch that elevated express which would have landed him at his office in time to meet the important business appointment? I tell you there is something weak about a man's head who will continually swear at everybody and everything. There is something soft about his brain as well as something very sinful about his heart.

A Mockery of God

Profanity is a monstrous habit. It either comes from a totally depraved heart, because that heart wishes to condemn a fellow human being to the awful agonies of an eternal condemnation, or else it teaches the users of profane words to have an utter contempt for the name of God and for his commandments.

Blasphemer, have you ever stopped to consider what would be the effect of your profane words by which you condemn your fellow-men, if they were literally carried out? Have you ever stopped to consider that when you ask God to condemn your fellow-men to the infernal regions, you express a desire that through all the coming ages they will suffer greater torture than ever a human victim suffered upon the operating table, under a surgeon's knife, when anesthetics could not be administered? You express a desire that they shall be thrown into "the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever." You express a desire by your profane oaths to see human beings suffer as Mark Antony and Cleopatra commanded them to suffer, when, at the banquet table, this guilty, merciless twain ordered poison to be administered to their slaves and prisoners, so that they might witness their convulsions in the throes of an awful death.

"But," answers some blasphemer, "you know just as well as I that there is not one man out of a thousand who ever means what he says, when he blasphemes. His profane oaths are mere exclamations. They come from the lip and not from the heart." Then, my brother, there is only one other deduction which can come from the use of this evil habit. Either you as a profane man wish to condemn your brother to eternal misery, or you are lacking in reverence to God, which is precisely the attitude condemned in this commandment. Either you despise your fellow-men, or else you despise the name of your Creator and your King. There is no other outcome to these two extremes. Either you are cursing your fellow-man, or else you are mocking your divine Maker.

A Horrible Alternative

The choice between these two evil aspects of profanity recalls the incident of the two dangers an Englishman had to run when he went to bathe in the Ceylon River. He asked his Mohammedan servant if he could tell him of one place in all the river where he could take a bath and not be in danger of being eaten up by the alligators. The Cingalese servant led him to a beautiful pool near the estuary. After the Englishman had taken his bath, he asked why that part of the river was not filled with alligators. "Because," answered the servant, "this part of the river is filled with sharks, and alligators are very much afraid of the sharks." The Englishman had to face one of the two dangers, either alligators or sharks. The user of profane oaths must face either the sin of wishing to condemn his fellow-men to everlasting suffering, or else he must face the sin of hurling his profane condemnations in defiance at his Divine Master and King.

The profane habit is to be dreaded, because it is often the outgrowth of seemingly very harmless beginnings. The blood-curdling oaths heard in the home of the rich man, and among the so-called respectable members of society, are not, as a rule, born among the saloons and the outcasts. They were not once the inhabitants of the slums and the places of wassail and crime. In all probability, their germs were fostered in the parlors of Christian homes and in the weekday schoolrooms, and even in the Sunday School rooms, attended by Christian children. These germs of the most horrible of profane oaths were once the exclamations and ejaculations and the slang expressions so commonly used by ladies and children upon our streets. They are the "By Georges," the "By Graciouses," the "By This," and "By Thats," and the "By Other Things." They are

PESTILENT PROFANITY

TEXT, Ex. 20: 7:

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain"

THE blasphemer's condemnation is a mighty theme. Its curse indirectly affects the whole human race. Every man belongs to one of two classes: either he is a blasphemer, and therefore, on account of his profanity, comes directly under the condemnation of God; or else he belongs to that large class whose ears are polluted by his profane utterances, in which class are some who listen with indifference or contempt, while others shudder with horror as they hear the blasphemous mention of the name of their Master and King.

No street car or factory or shop or camp is entirely free from this shocking plague. In our streets and public resorts, there is daily and hourly evidence of the prevalence of this pernicious habit. Not only does the husband and father swear, but his example is sometimes followed by his wife and his son, and even his little children. Motormen swear at the trucks. Engineers swear at their fires. Boys swear at their lessons in the school-room and at their baseball bats upon the playground. Merchants swear at their clerks. Employees, under their breath in the store and out loud when they are away from the counters, swear at their employers. Men swear when they are buying goods. Fishermen swear at their hooks and lines, and at the fish they do not catch. Commercial travelers swear because the train or the hotel meal is late, or because there is no water-pitcher in the bedroom. Sailors swear at the ropes and the winds. Farmers swear at the cattle, and the grain and the weather. Men swear at the gutter into which they tumble and at the wagon wheel which spatters them with mud. Blasphemers swear when they are happy; they swear when they are sad. They swear at everybody and everything. The peculiarity of this habit of profanity is that it so permeates the blasphemer's mind and conversation that he gets to swear unconsciously. He can swear automatically in the same way that the lungs can breathe automatically, or a child's eyelids can open and shut automatically, or as a speaker, when he is thinking and planning out an address, can walk up and down his study automatically. It is about time that Christian pulpits should utter their protest against the universal evil of sacrilegious imprecation.

A Cruel Habit

Profanity is a cruel and a cowardly habit, because it shocks the holiest feelings and pierces the hearts of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Christians who are unable by law to stop this awful and blood-curdling infamy. Only the other day, a telephone girl had a Chicago merchant arrested, and fined $20 and costs in the Police Justice Court, because the defendant swore at her over the wires. His defense before the Justice was that he was hungry and wanted to order his dinner from a neighboring restaurant, and that the girl in the central office of the Telephone Company would not give him the right connection. But when the Justice heard the young girl's statement, that she could not make the necessary connection because the lines were busy at that time, he decided against the defense of the Chicago merchant. He said: "No man has a right to hurl profane words at any public servant, when that man or woman is trying to do his or her full duty." But Christian people cannot as a class stop the profane remarks which they hear every day from the passers-by upon the different public thoroughfares, as did the Chicago telephone girl. They cannot do it by law, because, as a rule, the profane oaths which so cruelly cut and lacerate their feelings are not addressed to them, but to others, with whom they are unacquainted.

The blasphemer is essentially a coward, because he inflicts suffering on persons who are powerless to resist or retaliate. It is a hard word, but I use the plain, unvarnished Anglo-Saxon word which describes the cowardly act. I want you swearers to realize the extent of the injuries which you are doing against some of your fellow-men when you swear in public. I want you to fully realize how you are cutting and lacerating Christian hearts with your blood-curdling oaths, by trying to put yourself, if possible, in your Christian brother's place, who is compelled to listen every day to the public utterances of profanity. You can judge, perhaps, how your Christian neighbor feels, by supposing that some one is speaking slightly and disrespectfully and slanderously of some one you very dearly love. You have a mother, or a wife, or perhaps, to use a better illustration, a young daughter whom you fondly cherish. Suppose, in some public place, you should hear her name vilified? What would you do? Why need you answer? Even now, I can see your cheek flush and your teeth become set and your hands clench together. You would immediately demand an apology from the vilifier, or perhaps, if you are an impulsive man, you would raise your fist and knock that man down. You would do just what a friend of mine did some years ago in Waynesburg, West Virginia. He was bringing home the dead body of his little girl, who was his idol. As a great, rough, brutal porter took the coffin out of the baggage-car, he, the father, said to him: "Man, please be careful. Don't handle that box roughly." But when the porter, in spite of that plea, swore at the coffin, and used a contemptuous epithet about the beloved form within it, and roughly let the box tumble upon the depot, as an average expressman lets a trunk fall to the ground, my friend doubled up his fist and knocked that porter clear into the tracks. He hit him so hard, that the policeman who ran up, at first thought him dead. But though the policeman was about to arrest the suffering father, he did not; for when he heard how the porter had sworn at the body of the dead child, he turned and said: "Brother, if that brutal porter comes to, hit him again a little harder than you hit him before, and I will stand by, and, if necessary, help you." That spirit which my friend showed towards the porter, who swore at his little girl's body, you, oh blasphemer, would show towards any one who would insult the fair name of a pure, noble daughter, whom you devotedly loved!

Causes Poignant Suffering

Now, my sinful brother, you who are addicted to the habit of swearing in public, did you ever stop to think that, nearly always, there are Christian men and women around you who love the name of Jesus Christ more than they love their father or mother or wife or daughter, or you love your child? Did you ever stop to think that by your profanity you are dishonoring the name of that Christ for whom those men and women, if necessary, would be willing to die? Have you a right to insult their Christ's name any more than they have a right to insult your child? Oh, my blaspheming brother, I called you a cruel coward. I take it all back. I take that statement back, because you may have sinned thoughtlessly. I cannot believe that you have deliberately intended to do this cruel thing. In the past, you have not realized the enormity of the injustice which, by the public habit of profanity, you are doing against some of your fellow-men. You are so kindhearted, you would not hurt a dog or a cat. Surely, after this, you will cease to use blasphemous words in public, and not further cut and lash into the bleeding hearts of your Christian brothers and sisters with the sharp, merciless impiety which has heretofore proceeded from your profane lips.

Profanity is not only a cruel, but also a very foolish habit. My profane brother, can you cite me one instance in all your life when the indulgence in the habit of swearing helped you in the least? Did the stone over which you stumbled get out of your way and apologize to you because you cursed it? Did the winds ever abate when you were crossing the seas because you blasphemed them? Did your employees ever love you better or work for you harder because you lost your temper and hurled at them a whole tornado of oaths? Did your horse ever drive better because you swore at him until you were red in the face? Did the blood stop flowing when you cut your finger merely because you made the air sulphurous with your denunciatory imprecations? "No!" you answer. "I cannot think of one good result that ever came from the evil habit of profanity. It is such a foolish habit that I sometimes wonder why God does not let the sticks and the stones and the dumb brutes have power of speech to rebuke me, as he once bade the long-eared beast of burden open his mouth and speak to the quick-tempered and unreasonable prophet of old. I ought to have better sense."

A Useless Profanation

And yet this evil habit of profanity would be absolutely ridiculous and ludicrous if it were not so heinous in its results. We have read how one of the kings of old, in order to prove that he was master of the seas as well as of the lands, ordered his soldiers to come down to the seashore, and with whips lash the waves as they tumbled upon the beach. And when we read of that royal order, we have laughed at the king's actions as those of a madman and of an egotistic, crack-brained person. Wherever we have noted the imbecile act of an unbalanced mind, we have compared it to the insane ambitions of the hero of the celebrated Spanish romance which Cervantes wrote. But were the picture of a king fighting the waves with whips and lashes, or the escapades of a Don Quixote ever more ridiculous and imbecile than the act of a great, big, strong man cursing a stone merely because his toe stubbed against it, or swearing at the axle merely because the grease ran dry, or blaspheming the iron head of a hammer merely because he, as a carpenter, was clumsy-fingered and hit the end of his thumb instead of the nail in the plank? Was ever a sight more ridiculous, if there was not eternal misery in its outcome, than a man standing at the gate of an elevated depot cursing the train, and wishing that its platform wheels and glass windows and wooden seats might be consumed in the fires of an inferno, merely because he was too lazy to get up in time for breakfast, to catch that elevated express which would have landed him at his office in time to meet the important business appointment? I tell you there is something weak about a man's head who will continually swear at everybody and everything. There is something soft about his brain as well as something very sinful about his heart.

Profanity is a monstrous habit. It either comes from a totally depraved heart, because that heart wishes to condemn a fellow human being to the awful agonies of an eternal condemnation, or else it teaches the users of profane words to have an utter contempt for the name of God and for his commandments.

Blasphemer, have you ever stopped to consider what would be the effect of your profane words by which you condemn your fellow-men, if they were literally carried out? Have you ever stopped to consider that when you ask God to condemn your fellow-men to the infernal regions, you express a desire that through all the coming ages they will suffer greater torture than ever a human victim suffered upon the operating table, under a surgeon's knife, when anesthetics could not be administered? You express a desire that they shall be thrown into "the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever." You express a desire by your profane oaths to see human beings suffer as Mark Antony and Cleopatra commanded them to suffer, when, at the banquet table, this guilty, merciless twain ordered poison to be administered to their slaves and prisoners, so that they might witness their convulsions in the throes of an awful death.

"But," answers some blasphemer, "you know just as well as I that there is not one man out of a thousand who ever means what he says, when he blasphemes. His profane oaths are mere exclamations. They come from the lip and not from the heart." Then, my brother, there is only one other deduction which can come from the use of this evil habit. Either you as a profane man wish to condemn your brother to eternal misery, or you are lacking in reverence to God, which is precisely the attitude condemned in this commandment. Either you despise your fellow-men, or else you despise the name of your Creator and your King. There is no other outcome to these two extremes. Either you are cursing your fellow-man, or else you are mocking your divine Maker.

A Horrible Alternative

The choice between these two evil aspects of profanity recalls the incident of the two dangers an Englishman had to run when he went to bathe in the Ceylon River. He asked his Mohammedan servant if he could tell him of one place in all the river where he could take a bath and not be in danger of being eaten up by the alligators. The Cingalese servant led him to a beautiful pool near the estuary. After the Englishman had taken his bath, he asked why that part of the river was not filled with alligators. "Because," answered the servant, "this part of the river is filled with sharks, and alligators are very much afraid of the sharks." The Englishman had to face one of the two dangers, either alligators or sharks. The user of profane oaths must face either the sin of wishing to condemn his fellow-men to everlasting suffering, or else he must face the sin of hurling his profane condemnations in defiance at his Divine Master and King.

The profane habit is to be dreaded, because it is often the outgrowth of seemingly very harmless beginnings. The blood-curdling oaths heard in the home of the rich man, and among the so-called respectable members of society, are not, as a rule, born among the saloons and the outcasts. They were not once the inhabitants of the slums and the places of wassail and crime. In all probability, their germs were fostered in the parlors of Christian homes and in the weekday schoolrooms, and even in the Sunday School rooms, attended by Christian children. These germs of the most horrible of profane oaths were once the exclamations and ejaculations and the slang expressions so commonly used by ladies and children upon our streets. They are the "By Georges," the "By Graciouses," the "By This," and "By Thats," and the "By Other Things." They are the ejaculations which are used to-day by many people who consider themselves educated and polite and refined.

Profanity can grow from seemingly very harmless beginnings. Therefore, it is the duty of all Christian parents not only to refrain from the use of such unnecessary and absurd exclamations as those just quoted, but they should instill into their children the right use of the English language. The Anglo-Saxon tongue is a noble tongue. It is especially rich in vehement, emphatic, expressive, and if I might use the expression, sledgehammer words, powerful enough to annihilate any foe. In its broad sweep of denunciatory words, the English language is unexcelled by any language. Therefore, Christian parents, in the education of your children, you should teach them never to use slang. You should teach them that slang is only the immature child which will grow up into the destroying monster called Profanity. You should teach them that God hurls his condemnations at slang as well as at the hideous monster called Profanity, when Christ says, "Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the City of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Could any denunciation be more vehement against the use of the slang common among our women and children, and also among the men, than those words of Jesus Christ?

A Suicidal Habit

Profanity is a suicidal habit, because it runs directly counter to the expressed commands of God. Albert Barnes once wrote, "There is not in the universe more cause for amazement than God's forbearance in his dealings with the blasphemer." But that God will ultimately punish those who take his name in vain, there is no doubt. The Bible distinctly asserts it. And that God sometimes instantly punishes the sin of blasphemy is also unquestioned. Incident upon incident can be cited to illustrate this fact.

Some years ago, two English soldiers in the Chatham barracks gathered some of their comrades about them as judges. Then these two men made a wager. Then each started to find out who could utter the greatest number and the most awful variety of blood-curdling oaths, so as to win that wager. After one of the soldiers had gone on for awhile in his blasphemous sin, he suddenly stopped and said, "Now I shall utter one more oath, more horrible than all the rest of them, and then I am done." Instantly God's condemning wrath struck him dumb. For three long hours he suffered and struggled for breath. Then he died, a condemned blasphemer's death. After the heart of the blasphemer's body had ceased to beat, his corpse, by the order of his officers, was made a public spectacle to teach the populace and the soldiers and the sailors alike that they might realize the awfulness of the warning in the third Commandment, that "God will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." God's condemning wrath in that instance came as suddenly as a stroke of lightning.

My father often mentioned an incident showing how sometimes the wrath of God can and does strike the blasphemer down; how it can strike the profane lips in the twinkling of an eye. The scene took place in a noted infidel club in Scotland. That night it was decided by the club members that the man who could make the most awful oath in defiance of God should be elected president of the club. In this competition of oaths, one man uttered so vile an oath that his comrades were dumfounded. But no sooner was it unanimously decided that this blasphemer should take the president's chair, than his tongue began to swell. It kept on swelling until it protruded from the mouth. The blasphemer's tongue kept on swelling until the blasphemer died. He died quickly, because God had once said, in the words of my text, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

A Blasphemer's Doom

But though Kazlitt Arvine gives incident after incident where the condemning wrath of God has instantly slain the blasphemer, none of them ever made such an impression upon my mind as that which happened some years ago, practically under my own eyes. We were then stopping in Elizabethtown among the Adirondack Mountains. One afternoon a fearful thunder-storm came up. Before the tempest broke, it was almost black as night. The air became so still that even the leaves ceased to rustle. Nature was silent, save here and there when we heard a frightened bird twitter as she flew away to her nest and young. Then the winds began to blow. And those great trees began to groan and bend like monstrous human Laocoons with their children in the fatal grip of a destroying serpent dragging them down. Then the heavens became at times like great rivers of fire. The lightning struck the earth again and again. The golden grain, like a wounded and dying deer, bent the knee and pillowed the head in the mud. Everywhere were the awful, terrific exhibitions of a supernatural power. Amid this battle scene of the elements, a party of men were gathered in a barn but a short distance from the hotel piazza. In that company was an infidel, a blaspheming scoffer. When the conversation turned upon the power of God, he arose and said: "Even in this storm I am not afraid to defy God." He stepped to the open barn door and raised his arms, as he cried: "Curse God; strike if you dare!" Immediately there was a flash, and the blasphemer fell dead. The God who had uttered the words of my text had heard. God in one stroke of the unsheathed sword of fire made that blasphemer answer for his crime. Oh, my profane brother and sister, as the doom of the blasphemer sooner or later is bound to come, dare you to-day curse God? Dare you longer defy his will?

I have written this sermon upon the blasphemer's condemnation for two purposes. The first is, I want to make the blasphemer realize his awful danger, and by the grace of God, to rescue him, if possible, from the awful destruction towards which he is heading. I want to rescue him, by the grace of God, because, my brother, you will never be emancipated from this sinful habit of profanity unless you seek divine help. After you have been a profane man for many years, your profanity becomes a part of yourself. You are bound to this evil habit by links stronger than steel. Elon Foster tells us that there was once a godly man, who for thirty years had lived a consistent Christian life, who was taken seriously ill. During his delirious sickness he swore all the time. He swore, because the evil habit which he practiced in his youthful days was still lying dormant in his sub-conscious memory. So, my profane brother, if you wish to be emancipated from this sin of profanity, you must pray to God for help. You must plead and pray for divine help to resist this evil habit to the day of your death. You must pray not only for the forgiveness of your past profanities, but you must also pray that God will keep your lips pure from ever uttering another blasphemous word.

Organized Opposition

The second reason why I preach this sermon is to rally all Christian people to the support of a new interdenominational society, which has just been formed to war against the sin of profanity. I believe this society has as great a mission as the Christian Endeavor Society, the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, or any of the other interdenominational societies which are binding together the Christian people of the land. This society is called the Anti-Profanity League. Rev. John L. Withrow, D.D., an ex Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and the present pastor of the famous Park Street Church of Boston, has thrown the weight of his influence into it, and accepted the presidency. The object of this society is to rally all Christian people together to oppose this universal evil. That society will furnish you tracts. It will teach you what to do and what to say in the unrelenting war which hereafter we must all pledge ourselves to wage. That society called the Anti-Profanity League will arouse your holy enthusiasm, if you will only let it. Oh, my brother, will you ask God for help and consecrate your life to overcome the world-wide sin of blasphemy, as well as all the other kind of sins which are striving to destroy the Throne of Righteousness and are defying your Master and King? Lord God of the past, help us to make thy Son's name honored and worshiped all round this blaspheming, cursing and Holy Spirit defying world: around this world which more often hears the name of Jesus spoken in derision than in earnest, tender, heart-pleading prayer!

"The Whole World is Queer"

QUAINT PSALMS FOR QUEER FOLK

...By...
Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM I.

The Evergreen Psalm

3. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

"A TREE PLANTED BY THE RIVERS OF WATER"

The queerest folk in the world are Christians who neglect their Bible. They are green, instead of evergreen.

If any life prove a failure, the reasons may be found here. This Psalm is to be read with the Beatitudes in the beautiful chapter of the Bible, Matt. 5; and if verse seven of John 15 is added, it will change a fruitless life into a fruitful one—that is, it will if the truth be applied, for the seed of Scripture bears fruit only when planted in the soil of the soul.

PSALM II.

The Missionaries' Psalm

8. Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.

Missionaries are not queer, but their work is. To make sweet saints out of sour, pagan sinners, needs both Law and Love, and Calvary and this Psalm are full of both.

Well said Dr. Cuyler, "Sinai is not an extinct volcano."

This Psalm leads to the highest heights of Christian human hopes in extent of Gospel power. The "holy hill of Zion" is the highest peak, and calm reigns there; for it is the throne of the King. To Him shall every knee bow. The victory will be world-wide and complete.

"I WILL GIVE THEE THE HEATHEN FOR THINE INHERITANCE"

PSALM III.

Protection Psalm

1. Lord, how are they increased that trouble me! many are they that rise up against me!

2. Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. Selah. 3. But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lifter up of mine head.

4. I cried unto the Lord with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah.

5. I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the Lord sustained me.

In this Psalm it is the protection that is queer. The poor agnostic and poorer materialist, and the worldling without God, will find but little comfort and less help in Psalm III.; but the saved sinner, hard pressed by the enemy of his soul, knows where to get help, a help so great that he can feel safe, asleep or awake.

One against ten thousand is big odds; but David had a great God, and He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

"AND HE HEARD ME"

PSALM IV.

Godly Man's Psalm

3. But know that the Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself: the Lord will hear when I call unto him.

"THE LORD HATH SET APART HIM THAT IS GODLY FOR HIMSELF"

The world sets apart great men, but God sets apart good men.

The godly man is for heaven by Divine choice.

It is far better to be good than great, to have God than gold, though one may have both. It is not wicked to be rich, nor is it pious to be poor. People seeking for gladness and peace had best search this way, but note—there is no room for the bed or boast of the godless.

A Lesson From a Baby's Prayer

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 30th, containing these words—"To redeem the Philippines. Christian America's opportunity, and why it should not be neglected," inspired me for a great effort, and I know "The King's business requires haste." It is the hour of Christian America's opportunity to bring the Filipino multitudes into the Gospel fold. That word hour is very emphatic, for while men slept "an enemy sowed tares." If America fails to improve this hour, there will be an enemy, who will take possession and withhold the Bible from these perishing souls. They are asking for the Bible. Shall we withhold it? Oh, that America may see her opportunity, and that good ministers, physicians, lawyers, workmen—yes, many good men and many good women, men with means and men without means, may have a vision of God, and of his kingdom, and consecrate themselves, and their all, that this strange people may know that their "Redeemer Liveth."

In my reading, a few days ago, an incident impressed me as to the essential thing in all religious work. A little child, whose mother was too ill to listen to her, while preparing for her night's rest, ran into her papa's study, and kneeling beside him, she said reverently her evening prayer, then added earnestly, "Oh, God bless my two pennies!" The father went to the mother at once to know what the child's petition meant. The mother said: "Ever since our little daughter gave two cents to the mission cause, she has offered up that earnest prayer." May we not learn one lesson from this dear child? It is true, for God has said it: "The gold is mine, the silver is mine," and it is our duty and privilege to bring it to him; but we know "the gift without the giver is bare," and so Christ, in his gracious words, "how much more will the Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them who ask the Father to follow every gift with earnest prayer." I hope and pray that many will respond to your glowing words.

GENERAL HOWARD ADDRESSING A TENT MEETING IN THE CUMBERLAND MOUNTAINS

O. O. Howard's
Story Continued

My Tour Among the Mountain Whites

A Gospel
Campaign in the Cumberlands

[The third instalment of Gen. Howard's narrative of his campaign in the Cumberlands is given below. It is, in many respects, the most interesting part of this remarkable story, and is rendered doubly so by the unique illustrations].

Still Climbing in Sky-Land

ATHOL, LEE CO., KY., Sept. 13.

Yesterday afternoon there was a group under the missionary tent at Elkatawa that you would have greatly enjoyed. Dr. Saunders has been drilling about a hundred children; whether they can read or not, they can say the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Apostles' Creed; about a dozen of them rendering them accurately. Besides this, if a child has come to this teaching but once or twice, a passage of the Master's instruction that may be sufficient to save his soul has been lodged in his mind. Sprightly, bright and intelligent the children appeared, as they recited and sang. They were well filled in with adults under the ragged, old, storm-beaten tent.

President Dinwiddie came down from Jackson and honored us with his presence at this gathering, and the Rev. Mr. Logan (soon to be a missionary to Japan) told the story of the serpents and the remedy—where the Brazen one was lifted up on a pole among the children of Israel—in a pictorial manner which our children will never forget. Dr. Guerrant and General Howard tried to show in a practical way how a child or young person may have the Christian impulse, and make a permanent decision to follow the Master.

The wind blew, and the tent was crazy, and the rain was descending in floods as we sang our last cheery song and received the benediction from Dr. Saunders.

A Queer Little Hamlet

Our little party, including Mr. Starke, the photographer, were up at dawn this morning, breakfasted between five and six at Mr. Dixon's (Elkatawa), and were on the train from Jackson in time to reach Athol before seven. Athol is a strange name, reminding me of an old Oriental city near Nineveh; but it is only the name. The place is a hamlet, with one store of general merchandise (Mr. Crawford's). Several houses are in sight, and heaps and heaps of ties ready for the market, and some evidences of prosperity. Hills and mountains here are very pronounced; but there are more fields for pasturage, with sheep and cattle in sight far up the steep mountain sides. The corn does not mount so near the peaks.

It being Saturday, the general merchandise store was crowded with young men from far and near. All came on horses or mules, some to the mill near by, and thence to the store, and some to the post-office within the store. I had a good talk with several of these youths. Some could read, but the most of them could not. All were interested to hear of the Log College, and especially of Grant-Lee Hall, and the schools at Cumberland Gap.

If I may believe the talk here and there, there are more dangers to young men round about Athol than in any other centre which I have been able to visit in the mountains. The prevailing danger comes through the influence of strong drink. One remark was, "We do not dare to have dances, for with the dances come drinking, carousing and quarrels." Several men got into a fight about a month ago near here; three were killed. The trouble originated at a dance, and liquor was at the bottom of the quarrel. I heard another remark: "Our young women are usually good and doing well; but some of our young men are very, very wild!"

A Mountain Audience

This state of things made it doubtful if we could have an audience of any considerable size this morning (on a week day at the little church where Mr. and Mrs. Parmelee (an aged couple and devoted Christians) have been for some time conducting the religious services, which always includes a remarkably thorough Sunday School for the children. After the fog of the morning, the sun came out with great clearness, and the weather was ool and fine, just the sort for an assembly. We were agreeably disappointed; the church was quite full at ten. Like all the mountain audiences, this one was replete with men, women and children, and I was glad enough to observe the back seats occupied by fine looking young men.

THE SERIOUS MOUNTAIN FOLK

These people are always serious. Loud laughter is seldom heard; whistling never, and the women, as a rule, have a streak of sadness in their countenances. Their hardships are great indeed. Dr. Guerrant was even more fervent than ever, after the first songs, when he read the Scripture and prayed. Again he contrasted life with death, and begged every soul to choose life. General Howard followed his illustrations by showing the great power of kindness. He said it was the gentle who were to inherit the earth. He illustrated his thought by the manner Pennsylvania general and his wife had, by Divine help, converted Fritz Schlumberger. Fritz acknowledged publicly, before an assembly of English, French and Germans at Potsdam, Germany, that he had improperly ridiculed his general during the war. "That general was right, and I was wrong," he said. Fritz had been a hard drinker, and became a splendid temperance man. Gen. Howard educated the young men to let liquor alone. The work here of the Soul Winners is deep and strong, though there will be opposition, as there always is, when more and more light breaks in. If I only could show the wonderful work which has gone out far and wide in the two counties, from this little cottage, where Mr. and Mrs. Parmelee have resided for a year, it would delight me. I find a general sorrow that they are about to leave this field for another.

Sunday, which has been so generally marked throughout the country as the anniversary of President McKinley's death, found us back at Elkatawa. The large tent, which has been almost worn out in its travels from place to place, and in its being a veritable establisment to so many mountain churches, tattered and rent as it is in every part, this glorious Sunday morning was still able to hold itself between a good congregation and the sun. The people generally came on foot to the morning Sunday School and subsequent service. Miss Anne with her little organ, and the venerable Dr. Saunders, Dr. Guerrant and Gen. Howard gave the assembly a "long holding."

Excepting in the case of a few wild boys scattered outside by the fence, the speakers were able to keep up the interest from beginning to end. The incident of the last dying whisper of Dudley Tyng to his father, at the place where his arm was torn off in battle, when he sent the strong message in four words, "Stand up for Jesus," to his brethren in the ministry, caught the ear and lodged in the memory of those children. Then the telling how to repent so as to be at unison with God and man, seemed to startle some of the younger men, and interest them; but perhaps the most effective work was done by the prompt and courageous recitations of the children in Scripture passages.

At three in the afternoon the assembly gathered as before. You could see them in their picturesque costumes for long distances along the railway, and down the close, hovering mountains and valleys on either side; horses, mules, and some country wagons with rough boards for seats, this time found their way to the vicinity of the tent. It was a better audience than that of the morning; more young men and more adults, including a few veterans of the Civil War. Oh, that your readers could have heard the rapid, pungent, strong pleading of the president of the Soul Winners' Society! It seems as though, if I were a young man, I could not resist his call to duty, nor have answered the logic of his pleading. I do not wonder that people hear him gladly.

UNDER THE OLD TENT

Then, like the blind man who was healed, Gen. Howard took the young people with him, back to the days of his youth, and showed them how he was cured of his own spiritual blindness, and enabled to find a great Saviour—a Saviour he could always flee to in days of distress or of conscious sin. The Lord, his Saviour, was equal to every want of the mountain hand, and part of the money is already raised for a new structure; yet like the tabernacle of Moses to all believers, its remembrance will never pass from the recollection of the Soul Winners of these mountains. OLIVER OTIS HOWARD.

Arrival at Jackson

JACKSON, KY., Sept. 15th.

Our little party of travelers were up, as usual, at the first crowing of the chickens, and breakfasted before six o'clock. Early rising and quick preparation for the day's work were to veterans like Dr. Guerrant and myself, emphatic reminders of soldier campaigning times. We both sprang into the passenger coach, and were hurried on, this time not over, but under a mountain, to the terminus of broad-gauge railways in this direction—namely, the little city of Jackson, the capital of Breathitt Co., and the focus of life and energy, in the struggle for the mastery of forest, of rugged wooded hills, of mountain sides to be terraced and planted, and of men—sometimes of clan against clan, and party against party.

Met at the train by President Dinwiddie, we ascended to the College campus (no, it is called the Collegiate Institute), in which the industrial features are superb. Jackson is situated in a big basin, with a rough and hilly bottom, and with a rim of gorgeous mountains.

The Presbyterian Church (Dr. Guerrant's first love) and the Methodist, with over, for the lumber lies close at hand, for huge rafts, shelters and booms for logs, courses past the railway station, and gives to the people a commendable bridge. There is no other water power in Jackson; but there is steam enough for the mills, as well as for the industrial department of the Collegiate Institute.

You could not have had a better dinner in New York than we had with the teachers and president's family, under Miss Irvine's direction. She is the house-keeper and matron, and Miss Roach, whom we brought away, has been the leading instructor in domestic science. Mrs. Beauchamp and her teacher, Miss Pettit, urged me to go further up the North Fork to Hindman, where they are working in the name of the W. C. T. U., and are becoming well known in the industrial lines of training. There cannot be, particularly for the young women, too much instruction in domestic science.

At one o'clock all of us were in the Court House. The main court room was soon full, and Dr. Guerrant said there never was a larger or more representative audience in Jackson. After Mrs. Dinwiddie with the organ, had led us in "The Rock of Ages," the Doctor rather startled me by telling more of my history than I had dreamed he knew. He put it in such a way that I wished I might, by Divine help, attain to half the measure of it; but it seemed to interest the people, many of whom represented one side or the other of the great Civil War.

General Howard began his address with the loving kindness and followed on the great Father love—patriotic and Christian.

He found the wrath of God always manifesting itself in the lives of men who continue breaking God's law. The violent man, and the drunkard and the robber are abiding under the wrath of the Almighty. The Lord has appointed a way to remove that wrath forever. It is often impossible, except by the help of a friend or friends as mediators. He illustrated that point by showing how a son and his father, who had been dreadfully alienated, became fully reconciled. Our great Master is the all-sufficient Mediator between us and our Heavenly Father. When that mediation is received and completed, then quarreling ceases, and loving kindness comes in.

The Methodist clergyman, Mr. Hiner, made a beautiful closing prayer.

To me, the experience of a lifetime seemed to be condensed into the last eleven days of our journeying into the mountains, drained by the Kentucky River with its forks and branches. A hundredth part of what has been seen and heard, can never be told; but I say, as the minister often does at the close of reading a passage of Scripture—"May our Heavenly Father greatly bless his own work, and his diligent, self-denying workers in all the fastnesses of the Cumberland Mountains." tain youth. That old tent rang with the praises of song once more, and I felt a twinge of sorrow when the minister spread out his hands and feelingly pronounced the benediction. That tent seemed to me to have something of the meaning of the old flags of our country, which brave soldiers have carried in battle; as in them, so in this, there is a history that cannot be told or written. Its uses are about a Baptist structure soon coming, the Court House, the jail (that ought to be impervious to lynchers, but I believe is not), the several large stores and many well-constructed dwelling houses, including two hotels and some pretentious saloons, constitute the apparent make-up of the town. Arbitrate the Coal Strike

WITH genuine regret, the country has noted the failure of President Roosevelt's well-meant effort to end the coal strike and relieve the fuel famine. It was, indeed, a notable thing that the Executive of the nation should appeal to the justice and patriotism of the two parties involved in this dispute, to sink personal interests for the sake of the country, and it was an extraordinary and wholly unprecedented thing that such an appeal, from such a source, should have been rejected by either side.

But, though no truce has come through this incident, it cannot fail to have a tremendous moral influence, since it has shown that the President, as the representative of the whole people, believes that the trouble can be and ought to be settled by mediation or arbitration. In the broadest sense, there can be no dispute within the whole range of human experience which is wholly incapable of being arbitrated. The coal strike is not an exception to this rule. It has already been prolonged beyond all reason and it has involved the whole country in suffering and distress. President Roosevelt's appeal was no overdrawn picture, when he told the operators and the miners' representatives that a winter fuel famine would be in the nature of a catastrophe, the terrors of which we can hardly appreciate. Blind indeed and selfish must be he who would refuse to listen to an appeal which aimed solely to avert human suffering, to save human life, and to prevent conditions which might threaten disorders more dire and evils more far-reaching and appalling than thoughtful and patriotic citizens dare to contemplate.

There comes a time when the individual interest should bow to the community interest; when men should make sacrifice of themselves for their fellow-men. That time has now arrived in the coal strike. Public sentiment demands that both parties to the strike call a halt in their quarrel. The conditions of life in nearly a score of States have become intolerable through the fuel famine. Everywhere the people are murmuring. They have no sympathy with the policy that would prolong the strike, in the face of the widespread public suffering and in defiance of the popular appeal, as expressed by the President.

In their extremity, the people turn to the President as the representative of the highest authority, and also as their personal representative. They have confidence in his common sense and love of justice. His love of peace has been strengthened by experience in war. At the close of the conference with the operators and miners, and after listening to the operators' appeal for "troops to end the strike," the President epigrammatically remarked, "Arbitration beats the bayonet." It was not an official utterance, but it was one that will live, and pass into history. Notwithstanding the rejection of his overtures for a settlement of the strike, the people believe that the key to the solution of the difficulty lies in his hands, and that the higher law—unwritten, unrecorded, yet absolute—which demands the preservation of truth, justice and the interests of humanity, will yet assert itself to bring about a return to reason and a resort to arbitration in the Pennsylvania mines.

Growth Under Pressure

THE life that is breathed into us by God's Spirit has ever to do an uphill work. It has to grow against the gravitation of sin. It has to exert itself against the weariness of the flesh, and the heaviness of the soul, sometimes oppressed by weights that are invisible to human eyes. It has to push up, like Sisyphus, the stone of endeavor to the top of the hill, notwithstanding that it rolls down again and again. But if we are rooted in the Divine love, if we are abiding in Christ, our spiritual life will grow, and in the end will overcome all that opposes, and all that oppresses it.

John Spreull, of Glasgow, who for his defense of religious liberty in the times of Claverhouse, was imprisoned on the Bass Rock in the Firth of Forth, had a singular coat of arms. It consisted of a palm tree with two weights hanging from its branches, one on either side, and yet, in spite of the heavy down-dragging force, maintaining its upright position, carrying its graceful crown of foliage up into the serene air. And on the crest was inscribed the motto: Sub pondere cresco—I grow under a weight.

That is the law of the world, and not less of our spiritual life. It is the great mystery of providence that there should be such a vast amount of painful burden-bearing in the world, and much of it without apparent cause in the character of the sufferers. But if we are really Christians, no trouble, no sorrow of heart shall destroy us, no weight shall crush us. On the contrary, what a beauty and grace have we often seen the spiritual life take on under the pressure of these "light afflictions which are but for a moment."

It is said that the capital of the Corinthian column, the loveliest of all the styles of architecture, derived its origin from a basket of offerings placed upon a child's grave, and covered with a tile to protect it from the birds. The basket chanced to stand upon the root of an acanthus, a species of thistle, and the plant grew and spread its leaves around it in so graceful a manner, that it suggested to a passing artist the form of the Corinthian capital.

Even so, the pressure of earth's troubles causes the spiritual life to develop around them its fairest forms, and the thorny sorrow that springs from the grave of some dead love or hope, becomes the richest adornment of the soul.

Grateful India Missionaries

THE following letter, from Rev. J. E. Robinson, editor of the Indian Witness, will be read with general interest by all who have had a part in the India relief and orphan work:

Dear Sir:—The extract attached below is taken from an editorial in the Indian Witness of September 4. It expresses the mind of the Committee, and it would be very gratifying to our missionaries generally if you should kindly reproduce it in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Formal recognition of the invaluable services of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and of India's great indebtedness to Dr. Klopsch personally, has been placed on record on previous occasions. The sentiments expressed in the extract I send you are the informal, but no less cordial, appreciation of what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—which includes the worthy associate editors as well as the editor-proprietor—has done for India in its hour of dire need.

With best wishes and kindest fraternal regards.

Calcutta, September 4.

J. E. ROBINSON.

"The Committee, in the course of its business, also met with numerous proofs of the invaluable assistance rendered by the New York CHRISTIAN HERALD. Its record is unparalleled in the annals of journalism, not only by reason of its truly magnificent relief work in behalf of India, but also because of its noble efforts for the relief of suffering in other lands. Dr. Klopsch will be gratefully remembered for years and years to come for his personal sympathy and interest in India, no less than for his editorial assistance. Large sums contributed by Americans of all denominations through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were poured into India, and these were distributed under most careful supervision of a large number of missions of various lands and churches."

Editorial Notes

ONE OF THE most remarkable Congressional documents issued this year, is that which relates to the public cost of crime. It embodies an address by Eugene Smith, of New York, in which statistics are submitted, showing that, in our great cities, one-half the total amount raised by taxation is chargeable to the cost of crime. The same is relatively true of State taxation. New York City, in 1899, expended nearly $13,000,000 on direct account of crime, this total including police, district attorney, courts, jurors, special commissioners, department of correction, etc., and about $7,000,000 on indirect account, making a grand total of $20,000,000 out of an annual budget of $90,000,000. The cost per capita on account of crime, in different States, is placed at $350 yearly. Nor does this represent the whole, for there are thousands of cases into which crime enters, but where the proportions are indivisible. Looking at society through the calculative lenses of the statistician, it would certainly seem that we have still a long way to travel to the millennium.

THE ONE REDEEMING feature of Zola's career, was his fervent and even noble championship of Dreyfus. His early literary work had an unwholesome influence on the age, and his scientific pretensions were never regarded seriously; but he was an intense lover of fair play, and his gallant assaults upon the "Jew-baiters" will be remembered when all else that he wrote is forgotten.

The President and the Strike

RESPONDING to President Roosevelt's invitation, the leading coal operators and the representatives of the United Mine Workers met the President, in the latter's temporary residence in Washington, on Oct. 3, at 1 A.M. Those present were Railroad President George I. Baer, W. H. Truesdale, E. B. Thomas, Thomas P. Fowler and David Wilcox, representing the leading railroads; John Mitchell, President of the United Mine Workers, and several other labor representatives. Attorney-General Knox, Secretary Cortelyou and Carroll D. Wright, Commissioners of Labor.

President Roosevelt, lying in his rolling-chair, read to the meeting a brief statement, in the course of which he said there were three parties to the strike—the operators, the miners, and the general public—and he (the President), spoke for the last named. He disclaimed any right to interfere upon legal grounds, but in view of the fuel famine and the nearness of winter—a situation which threatened a "terrible catastrophe," he considered it his duty to use his personal influence in bringing about an amicable settlement. He considered that the situation imperatively required that all personal interests be sunk for the time being, and that the parties meet upon the common plane of public necessity, and make sacrifice for the public good. He desired no discussion of the merits of the case, but simply appealed to their patriotism and public spirit.

Mr. Mitchell, replying for the miners, expressed his willingness to meet the operators and try to adjust their differences. He asked that the President name a tribunal to determine the issues.

At President Roosevelt's suggestion, a recess was taken until 3 o'clock, to allow all parties to consider what should be done.

At 3 o'clock, the operators were ready with their statements in reply to the President. Short addresses were read by President Baer (Reading R. R.), President Thomas (Erie), President Truesdale (D. L. & W.), Vice-President Wilcox (Delaware & Hudson), President Fowler (N. Y., O. & W.), and also by President Mitchell, of the Miners' Union. In substance, the remarks of the operators were to the effect that anarchy prevailed at the mines, and that they could not arbitrate with men responsible for mob violence. They called upon the President to use the powers of the National Government and send troops to restore order. If protected they declared, they could operate the mines and relieve the famine. President Mitchell, in a brief address, renewed his proposal of arbitration by a tribunal of President Roosevelt's selection, and pledged the miners to abide by any award that may be rendered. He denied the allegations of murder and outrage at the mines; said the miners had been slandered and misrepresented; and asserted that much of the lawlessness had been provoked by criminals who were brought into the anthracite regions to aid the coal and iron police.

President Roosevelt asked the operators if they would accept Mr. Mitchell's proposition for a tribunal of arbitration of the President's appointment. They answered, "No," and added that they had no further proposition to make.

This ended the conference. There was no attempt at discussion of the merits of the case by either side.

Among the Workers

—REV. J. P. McNAUGHTON, American Board missionary at Smyrna, writes that great suffering has been caused by fire in the town of Afion Kaya Hissar, which destroyed 80 Armenian and 300 Turkish homes. The Armenian population is largely destitute, and Mr. McNaughton appeals in their behalf.

—ON A RECENT occasion, Rt. Rev. Dr. Moreland, Bishop of Sacramento, accepted an invitation to preach to an audience of Jews and Gentiles in a Hebrew synagogue in that city. He took for his topic, "The debt which the Christian owes the Jew."

—THE OUTCOME of the summer gospel M. E. tent campaign in St. Louis was seven hundred professions of faith, two new churches, and many additions to other churches. Evangelists Hart and Magann had charge of the meetings.

—MRS. BALLINGTON BOOTH issues a denial of the current report that Hope Hall, in Flushing (where she has conducted her work among liberated prisoners) is to be sold. She declares that the majority of the people of Flushing favor the work. Hope Hall will go on, and its founder, during the coming winter proposes to extend the work still further.

—REV. ESSEK W. KENYON has recently held a series of Evangelistic Services in several of the villages in Westerly and Hopkinton, Rhode Island, and is again laboring in that field. Over a hundred persons, including business men, heads of families and young people have confessed Christ.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Zola Dead

ALL France was startled on the morning of Sept. 29, by the news that Emile Zola, the most famous of its living writers, was dead. In other lands, too, the intelligence caused a shock of surprise, for his works had been translated into many foreign languages and had been widely read. He was only sixty-two years old, and was as active and as vigorous and as prolific in the press as he was a quarter of a century ago. His death was due to an accident. He and his wife had been staying at his country house at Medan, but returned unexpectedly to Paris. Some repairs in his Parisian residence had been ordered, but were not then completed. Among them was a flue, which had been topped by the fall of part of a chimney. Disregarding this fact, as it was chilly, a fire was lighted in the bedroom occupied by the couple. They retired to rest, and early in the morning, when a servant entered the room to awake them, both were unconscious. Medical assistance was at once summoned and the life of Madame Zola was saved. Her illustrious husband, however, had passed beyond the reach of medical skill. The position of his body showed that he had attempted to rise, but had fallen to the floor, where the fumes from the choked flue were dense, and he had there become asphyxiated. The news spread quickly through the French capital, and general sympathy was expressed. Even his bitterest enemies admitted that he was the most popular of French writers. For thirty-five years the public had eagerly read his works. The moralists frowned upon them, but all his countrymen read them, and foreign critics recognized his genius. The pictures he drew of the life of the worst element in French society were shocking, repulsive in the extreme, but they had the ring of truth. Vice was presented boldly in its hideous deformity, and the exposure was horrible. Zola did not renounce it; he photographed it, and allowed the picture to speak for itself. Parents naturally regretted that the minds of the young should be polluted by the knowledge of the existence of such horrors as Zola depicted; but at least it must be said that no one who read his books would be attracted to the evil by his description. In his later works he rose to a higher level, and dealt with cleaner scenes of French life with no less vigorous realism. He added to his name in lands outside his own, by his valorous championship of Captain Dreyfus. It was mainly due to his famous letter to the President of the French Republic, accusing by name prominent statesmen and officers of falsehood and conspiracy, that Dreyfus was brought back from his island prison, tried and released. Zola had to pay a penalty for his courageous course. He was sued for libel and other offences growing out of the Dreyfus case, and was condemned to imprisonment for a year and to pay a fine of three thousand francs ($600.) Other suits were begun against him, and finally his furniture and library were ordered to be sold, to satisfy judgments aggregating six thousand dollars. His enemies rejoiced at the thought of how Zola would grieve over the loss of his treasures; but he had more friends than they supposed. On the day of the sale, an ordinary library table was the first to be offered by the auctioneer. For this table, worth about twenty dollars, the first bid was $6,400, and that being sufficient to satisfy the judgments, the sale ceased, and Zola's other goods were not disturbed. It was a remarkable testimony to the sincerity of the friendships he had made. It was also a remarkable exhibition of obedience to the admonition of the patriarch: To him that is ready to faint, kindness should be showed from his friend (Job 6: 14).

Protest Against Tattooing

Among the unaccountable fancies that boys seem to conceive almost as an epidemic, the desire for being tattooed has developed in boyish society on the East Side of New York. It has become so general, that the boy who could not show some device on his hand or arm was regarded as behind the times, a boy who had no spirit. It was not always easy for the boys to raise the funds necessary to have a Statue of Liberty, or a dragon pricked on their persons, but so earnest were they to be in the fashion, that they persuaded an artist in tattooing to do business on the installment plan. A device costing two dollars was pricked on the arm or chest, when one dollar had been paid, and the balance was paid in nickels every week. The matter came before a police magistrate last week, when a Hebrew produced his twelve-year old son in court, and showed the picture of a crucifix on his left arm. Other Jews were in court on a similar errand, the crucifix being a favorite device of the tattooer's. The judge could not erase the marks. All he could do was to put the artist under bonds to tattoo no more boys unless they could produce the written consent of their parents. It is not surprising that the Hebrews were distressed, for the practice is distinctly forbidden in their law (see Lev. 19: 28), and their indignation would be intensified by the tattooing being a crucifix. Very few of them, as yet, are like the Apostle Paul, who gloried in the fact that he was branded by his sufferings as Christ's servant:

THE LATE EMILE ZOLA

Henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear on my body the marks of the Lord Jesus (Gal. 6: 17).

A House Stolen

The owner of a house in the suburbs of Brooklyn, N. Y., was an indignant complainant at the Fifth Avenue Police Station last week. He said that a house belonging to him, situated in an outlying district of the precinct, had been stolen. He owned considerable property in different parts of the city, and had not paid much attention to this particular house. It was unoccupied, and had been so for some time. As the demand for small houses had increased lately, he thought a tenant for this one, which was a two-story frame building, might be obtained. He therefore sent workmen to put it in tenantable repair. They had returned to him with the report that they could not find the house. He investigated the matter himself and found that it had totally disappeared. From the neighbors, he learned that it had been removed piecemeal by about a hundred men and boys, who had only within a few days carried off the last fragments for firewood. The owner, not unnaturally, blamed the police, who, if they could not prevent household effects being stolen, should, he thought, at least prevent thieves stealing a house who had married them, she replied that the ceremony had been performed by the Registrar of Vital Statistics. Knowing that no marriages were performed by that functionary, the attorney asked to see the marriage certificate. The woman produced a document, which proved on examination to be merely a marriage license. When this was explained to her, she said that both she and her husband thought that when they received the license they were legally married, and had lived together ever since. When she understood the situation, she went away crestfallen. There is reason to fear that a similar awakening awaits some people who regard themselves as Christians. It is hard to get them to realize that neither knowledge of the plan of salvation, nor church connection, can avail them without vital union with Christ.

Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets; but he will say I know you not (Luke 13: 26).

A Gambler's Appeal

A strange story was told in the Jefferson Market Police Court in New York last week. A well dressed young man was before the court, who seemed more anxious to become a complainant than to defend himself from the charges brought against him. He told the Justice that the game of poker had an irresistible fascination for him. He had tried to keep away from the game, but could not. He always lost his money, and it was becoming a serious question whether it would not end in his ruin. He had pleaded with the keepers of the rooms where the game is played, not to let him play. He had even forbidden them to admit him, and had threatened them that if they allowed him to play he would report their establishments as gambling houses and have them raided. But when the craving returned on him, he was just as earnest in begging for admission and as desirous to play the game. Evidently the man has two personalities, and recognizes in one condition the idiocy of his behavior in the other condition. What a pity it is that he does not adopt the means the Apostle did in a similar difficulty:

I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind and bringing me into captivity. . . O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord (Romans 7: 23-25).

BRIEF NOTES

Bishop Stuart, late of Waipatu, who has just arrived in England, has resigned his see in New Zealand, in the midst of a most successful episcopate, in order that he might go to preach to the Moslems in Persia.

Dr. I. W. Munhall commenced a series of evangelistic services at Paris, Ill., on Sept. 10. Seven churches united in the movement. The meetings were held in a tent which had a seating capacity of 2,500 persons. A choir of one hundred and fifty voices, led by Prof. Fugh, rendered excellent service. The audience have been very large, and a deep interest was manifested. It is believed that all the churches will receive large accessions through the meetings.

The third year of the Bible Teachers' Training School, of which Dr. Wilbert W. White is President, will open Wednesday, October 15, in the chapel of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-fifth Street, New York City, where the lectures and recitations will be held during the coming year. Among the lecturers and instructors announced, in addition to Dr. White, are Dr. A. F. Schaeffer, Dr. Robert W. Rogers, of Drew Theological Seminary; Dr. D. S. Gregory, of the Homiletic Review; Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston; Mr. Robert E. Speer, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; Miss Caroline M. Holmes, Principal of the Training School for Christian Workers, New York; Miss Caroline L. Palmer, of New York City, and Rev. George Soltau, of England. Dr. White will conduct a Teachers' Training School in the Calvary Baptist Church, Dr. R. S. MacArthur, pastor; also one or two popular Bible classes.

An Immigrant's Mistake

The appeal of an Italian woman to the City Attorney of New Haven, Conn., a few days ago, led to a discovery that startled her. She said that her husband, who formerly gave her all his earnings for household expenses, had of late been spending them in dissipation. She wanted the law applied to him to compel him to support her and their infant child. The attorney asked her how long they had been married, and she told him they had been married nearly two years. Asked

A WATER-CARRIER IN HONDURAS

In the Land of Volcanoes

RECENT events in Central America have directed attention anew to that interesting, though but little known section of the American continent. Revolutionary movements in some of the Isthmian republics, international disputes in others, and, above all, the terror and dismay inspired of the recent earthquakes, have all been subjects of comment in other lands.

From a worker of the Central American Mission, Mr. A. E. Bishop, of Guatemala City, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following interesting letter concerning affairs in that disturbed part of the globe: "Central America might well be designated 'The Unknown Land,' as multitudes of intelligent, well-informed people know little or nothing of its geographical, political or religious conditions. Central America, proper, lies between Mexico and the Isthmus of Panama, comprising the British Colony of Belize and the five independent Republics of Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Salvador and Costa Rica, which, in fact, are not republics, but military despotisms. Such a thing as liberty is al-volcanoes, perhaps, than any other like territory in the world; yet it is rich in agricultural possibilities as well as in mineral deposits. Earthquakes are of frequent occurrence, the most destructive in recent years occurring April last, when the beautiful city of Quesaltenango was almost entirely destroyed.

"The principal means of transportation throughout the interior are pack mules and Indians. It is no unusual sight to see an Indian carrying four sacks of flour (200 pounds) on his back, sustained by a broad leather band across his forehead. In each of the republics there are short lines of railroads running from the seacoast into the interior, and in some of them there are a few cart and stage roads; but the mule and Indian form the chief basis of locomotion and transportation.

"The Indians, since the Spanish conquest, have been robbed, enslaved and dreadfully misused; yet with all the tyranny of four long centuries, the nobility of some of these ancient races has not been entirely obliterated, and to-day they are the peer of the mixed races. They are far more noble, and very much more industrious than the lazy, roaring Indian tribes. In the Republic of Guatemala we have over one million pure-blooded Indians, still speaking their own dialects, and divided into ten tribes. It can truly be said that no man has ever cared for their souls until two years ago, when Mr. C. F. Secord and wife arrived, and took up their abode among the Quiche Indians, the largest of the ten tribes, numbering 280,000. The official language of all of the republics, and that in general use is the Spanish.

Bible Study at Northfield

THE Northfield of D. L. Moody is essentially a Bible centre. At all times of the year the Bible and the Bible truths are paramount subjects. Bible lectures and discourses, modestly estimated, average more than two a day for every most unknown. Every able-bodied man is subject to six months' military service every year, if needs be. On the last Sunday of each month, all these are compelled to appear at the soldiers' barracks, where they receive slips of paper showing that they have presented themselves. These slips they are compelled to carry with them, and to show upon demand by the government police. If the unfortunate has lost his paper or left it at home, he is hustled off to jail. The form of an election is carried out, but intelligent free voting among the masses is unknown. Frequently the change of President or ruler comes through revolution. As a rule, the people are quiet and harmless. Revolutions usually occur through jealous leaders, stirring up the people.

"The country is very mountainous, and contains more how much more the spiritual or religious conditions. Four centuries of Romish rule have done nothing to uplift the poor unfortunates of this dark and unknown land. Superstition, darkness, ignorance and vice reign upon every hand. Idols of gold, silver, stone, wood and paper are worshiped with blind devotion. In Guatemala, the government statistics of some years ago give ninety-eight per cent. of the population as Roman Catholics.

"On the Atlantic Coast, the Moravian missionaries have done good work for years among the Mosquito Indians of Nicaragua. The Wesleyan Methodists of England have worked among the English-speaking negroes. Until the Central American Mission was formed, a little over ten years ago, little was done to give the Gospel to the people of the interior. The Mission is evangelical and undenominational, and is supported entirely by voluntary contributions. It now has thirty missionaries divided among the five republics. Blessing has attended the work from the beginning, and hundreds of souls have been converted. Many of the converts hope to give their lives to the spread of the Gospel; already many of them are doing Bible colportage work, but experience shows that it is needful to move slowly when sending them out or placing responsibility upon them. One of the great needs is a training school for preparing native converts for evangelistic and pastoral work. There are a good many believers scattered throughout numerous villages, some of whom are calling for pastors and help. At Guatemala City a new missionary is at work, who, in the States, had much experience in training of workers.

"The local work at Guatemala City, the metropolis of all Central America, has been notably blessed. Meetings are held every night. Many have been converted, and the interest and attendance increase. New faces are constantly appearing; many are hearing the Gospel and carrying the news to remote places. For more than two years, we have occupied a small, poorly ventilated hall, altogether inadequate for the growing work, but located favorably on a main thoroughfare, where more than 10,000 country people daily pass. It is hoped to have a suitable building day of the year. Many of these are courses covering a year or more; others deal with practical phases of the Scripture and are individual. Under the former classification are the Summer Bible School, the Bible Training School, and the Bible courses of the Northfield Seminary. Under the latter come the College Students' Boarding School, Girls' and Christian Workers' Conferences, and Post-Conference addresses.

The many thousands of people who attend the great religious gatherings held each summer at Northfield scarcely realize the educational activity of the place during the winter months. While the Post-Conference addresses were yet in progress, Mount Hermon School opened, with over four hundred students. Less than a month later, Northfield Seminary opens with about four hundred more, and on October first the Bible Training School begins its twelfth year. The Bible Training School differs from the Seminary and Mount Hermon in being maintained exclusively for training in the Scriptures, and in such supplementary subjects as will fit one for practical Christian work.

A RAINY DAY IN GUATEMALA

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

GATHER CLOSER ROUND THE FIRE

AN unparalleled condition of affairs in our country has been existent for several months, and now, with cold weather marching toward us as fast as it can, some of us are wondering how we are going to keep warmed and fed, when we cannot buy coal. Country people are much better off than town's people in such an emergency, for they may burn wood; indeed, they often use wood as their only fuel, and if the pile give out, they may go to the forests, and should the worst come to the worst, they can burn up the fence-rails. But what are we, who depend upon furnaces that yawn for great scuttles full of black diamonds, and upon ranges like caverns, that eat up the coal as fast as it goes into their mouths, to do?

Well, for one thing, we may learn frugality. We may gather closer round one fire, if we may not heat the whole house. We may do as our grandparents did, manage more economically than has been the recent custom in this vast, rich and most wasteful America. It will hurt none of us to draw the family into a well-knit and compact group when Jack Frost is raving wildly outside. The old people shall have the coziest seats in the nicest corner, with a screen between them and possible draughts. Father, with his paper, and mother, with her sewing, shall have places at the table where the children take their evening tasks, and the close neighborhood shall be most pleasant and helpful to all. Move the piano into the living room: concentrate the home interests there, even though it be a bit crowded. Shut up whatever part of the house cannot be warmly heated, and make the most of the space that is left. Don't be afraid of making your pretty things too common. What else are pretty things for but to enjoy, and to help educate the children, and to make your daily environment alluring and reposeful? Never mind the blasts outside. When the wild winds blow and the snows fall, gather close around the home hearth.

Partners

After a score or more of years spent together, husband and wife are one, in a sense true of no other relationship in the world. They understand one another's wants, and speech is not needed to explain, when look, and gesture, and the wordless sympathy of comradeship bind together those who are walking as partners on the same road. One constantly sees married persons who have grown into a real resemblance, simply through living in the same house. We imitate the facial motions, as well as the tricks of manner of those with whom we dwell, and the soul likeness goes deeper yet. Those who are partners in life are continually receiving and giving one another traits and features, as well as love and esteem.

That Rested Look

That tired look which steals into the faces of the hard working men and women around us, as the summer passes, has given place to a beautifully rested look, and as we walk the city streets we meet people whose tanned and sunburnt countenances fairly crinkle with good humor as they resume their daily tasks. The men have had a respite from ledger and counter, and have had tramps up the glen, hours of fishing in the brook, and sauntering the fields, and climbing the hills; the women have had picnics and drives and strolls, have lived in the open air, have played golf and tennis, or sat at fascinating fancy work on pleasant verandas. As for the children, words halt in the endeavor to describe adequately the glory of their summer days in the country and their multiplied delights.

Now it ought to be the turn of the farmer's wife and daughters to get the rested look back again in their faces. They have baked bread, pies and cake for large crowds of hungry people; they have hung out clothes by dozens on lines stretched across dewy grass, and they have been up early and late planning for the comfort of the city guests. It is their turn to enjoy the feast prepared by Mother Nature for her children every autumn. The finest weather of the whole year is coming, the most stimulating air, clear sunsets, crisp moonlit and starlit evenings, and the crickets droning so peacefully of the coming frost invite to rest and sleep, and the mornings speak of new health and vigor. Rest now, dear lady, whose kind hands have done so much to make the city people love you, and take the blessed good provided for you in your own home.

Cheery Countenance

Wonderful is the benefit one may derive from looking cheerful. Never mind how one may feel. A lady was congratulated not long ago on the gaiety of her manner. "It's on the surface," she said. And a very brave and very lovely thing it is to have this surface brightness if one has causes for disturbance underneath. If you have worries, keep them out of sight. If things are awry, wear the aspect of one who is determined to see only pleasant happenings. Cheer is magnetic. One really cheerful man or woman is worth rubies and diamonds to society, for his or her face is like the blessed sunlight.

The Coal Strike

By the time you read this, perhaps the great coal strike will be over. But as I write, thousands of householders are facing the necessity of buying coal for the winter at twice its usual cost, and for the very poor the future is gloomy. Do not let us be too discouraged. We wear through all sorts of things and come out little the worse, coal strikes included. We may learn to be less wasteful hereafter. A French matron will cook a fine dinner over a handful of coals. An American housekeeper or an Irish servant heaps the range to the lids, opens every draught, and shovels in coal with a reckless disregard of its value. Let us learn thrift, and the season's lessons will not have been in vain.

A FRENCH MARKET SCENE

Very animated in many features is a French market day. The village puts on its gala air. Neighbors meet and gossip. The peasants bring their little offerings of fruit and vegetables, eggs or chickens. Young lovers exchange glances, and older people arrange matches for their children. The scene is full of life, variety and gaiety.

IN GALILEE

THE Master walked in Galilee,
Across the hills or by the sea,
And in whatever place He trod
He felt the passion of a God.

The twelve who deemed Him king of men Longed for the conquering hour, when
The peasant's robe without a seam
Should be the purple of their dream.

Yet daily from His lips of love,
Fell words their thoughts as far above
As wisdom's utmost treasure, piled
Upon the stammering of a child.

Like frost on flower, like blight on bloom
His speech to them of cross and tomb:
Nor could their grieving vision see
One gleam of hope in Galilee.

What booted it that He should rise,
Were death to snatch Him from their eyes;
What meant a promised throne divine,
Were earth to be an empty shrine?

Low drooped the skies above the band,
Too dull the Lord to understand,
Alas! as slow of heart are we,
Abiding oft in Galilee.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Two Ways of Looking At It

"SUCH a care! A baby every second or third year. She never can go anywhere or do anything, unless she is tethered to her home by a two hours' string. I am desperately sorry for her."

"What a bonny bunch of children there are in Mrs. Elmore's home. Dorothy, Winifred, Laurence, Sydney, Emily, John—three girls and three boys, all growing up at once and keeping their father and mother busy and happy. That home is the sweetest spot in my bailiwick."

Here were two views from the outside, of a family group, where the young mother with her little ones about her, was indeed anchored to her household. The latter seemed to the quiet listener the better and truer view. "I expect," said a young wife, "to give up the first ten or twelve years of my married life to my children. I don't want an only child, or just two or three children. I'd like five at least; and I mean to enjoy them when they are little, and to postpone my life of independence till they are all fairly launched upon the world." The lady's face beamed as she spoke, glowed with the beautiful and sacred passion of maternity; and as she frankly confessed her wish for children, she placed herself above those whose reluctant motherhood shows how narrow are their hearts.

"But," there comes a voice from a home of never intermitted poverty, "is it right to bring children into the world, when you cannot hope to bring them up in comfort, or to give them a fair chance? If I had money in abundance, and could have help in taking care of my little ones, I would not be sorry at the advent of another infant."

It is an open question whether we are not inclined in this day to take our domesticity too seriously. Children used to be brought up, and creditably, too, by our grandparents, with an almost reckless freedom from fears of the future. They helped to "raise" each other. In a land of public schools, every boy and girl may be well taught at very slight cost to the householder, and the bright, book-loving lad and lass will win their way to the front rank, whether or not there is much money in the parental purse. Where the strife with limited means tells too harshly on the wife's health, she should not have her little ones, without a long enough interval between them to insure herself strength of body, and to give them enduring vitality, so that they may enter upon the world with a capital large enough to endure the inevitable drains that will come as they grow up. But this admitted, the mother with her bairns about her is not a person to be commiserated. She is rather to be envied, for she has the promise of much love in her declining years.

The fun, the frolic, the gleeful times, the joy, possible in the large family, can never be known where there are only one or two children. And the only child has many lonely hours, no matter how tenderly caressed, and how adored he or she may be, with always the peril of growing selfish and self-centred in the background.

Pretty Things to Give Your Daughter

Among pretty things to give your daughter, or your son, when one or the other is going on a journey, a small traveling case is one of the most desirable. These cases come in soft, flexible leather, lined with watered silk. They contain a pocket for a hand mirror, a case, snugly fastened, for tooth-brushes, nail-brush, and dressing comb and brush; for a cologne bottle, tooth-powder and soap, and for wax matches and a tiny candle. Nothing that can be useful to one on a shorter or longer trip is omitted from such a case, which rolls up and fits into a small compass in the larger grip or bag.

A silver hat-pin, a belt with a buckle, a little carved rack for books, and a hair-pin tray, are among other very desirable gifts. The holidays are a long bit ahead, but it is a good plan to make a memorandum now of articles that will be welcomed, and to save up, a little at a time, so that when Christmas does come, the gift-purse may not be empty.

LIFE'S TIME OF FRUITAGE

JOSHUA AND CALEB

JOSHUA 14: 6-15

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—JOSHUA 14: 14:
"HE WHOLLY FOLLOWED THE LORD"

BETWEEN the fall of Jericho and Caleb's request that Hebron be assigned to him, many things happened. The first was the defeat of the Israelites at Ai, when "the hearts of the people melted and became as water." Defeat came because there was a traitor among them. Achan was found to be the guilty one. He had taken spoils of Jericho, which belonged to God, and was therefore stoned to death. Then came a second victorious battle of Ai, when the historian says that the expedition was planned and aided by God himself. After that came Joshua's league with the Gibeonites. These people knew that being near to Ai their turn would come next, and so they preferred to surrender in advance, and in a way to save their cities. In order to deceive Joshua, they came to him as if from a long journey, with mouldy bread and broken wine skin bottles, dressed in wornout garments, all to make it seem they had come from a far country. Joshua's action in forming a league with them is hard to understand. There was a difference of opinion about it, even then. Many of the people, when the trick was known, murmured for vengeance against the deceivers, but the princes of Israel said: "We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel; now therefore we may not touch them." Then came the call of the Gibeonites for help from Israel, when five chiefs joined forces against them because of their league with Israel. The great battle of Beth-Horon followed, in which the five chiefs fought with the hosts of Israel. The Bible says that the Lord himself fought on the side of his people by casting down great hailstones upon the enemy when Joshua and his soldiers had put them to flight. Thus the rout became complete. The five kings hid themselves in a cave, and were brought forth and slain by the sword of Joshua himself. With this battle is connected the standing still of the sun at the command of Joshua, in order that the daylight might be prolonged to finish the battle. About this there has been much controversy, but in some miraculous way the coming on of darkness was delayed. This battle is classed in importance by Dean Stanley with six other great battles: The battle of Milerian Bridge, which involved the fall of Paganism; the battle of Poitiers, which sealed the fall of Arianism; the battle of Bedr, which opened the way for Mahomedanism in Asia; the battle of Tours, which checked the spread of Mahomedanism in Western Europe; the battle of Lepanto, which checked the spread of Mahomedanism in Eastern Europe; the battle of Lutzen, which determined the balance of power between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism in Germany.

After Beth-Horon came the battle of Merom, where Joshua and his forces fought against the so-called "King of Canaan," otherwise known as "Jabin the Wise." All of the Canaanite races were banded together for one mighty conflict on the northern extremity of Palestine. They had come from the South as far as Jebus, afterward Jerusalem; from the sea plain of Philistia, and from Sharon. For the first time Israel was to meet a foe armed with chariots. But the command was given to Joshua: "Thou shalt hough their horses (that is, cut the tendons of their hind legs), and burn their chariots with fire." Of that battle, we only know that the Lord delivered the Canaanites into the hand of Israel, who smote them and chased them. This was the last great battle of the conquest.

Then came the division of the land. Each family was to have an absolute title to a farm or plot in the Land of Promise. If the family lost it, it would come back in the Jubilee Year, the 50th. But before these homes were allotted, Caleb came and claimed that Hebron should be his portion, where he had, forty years before, found the best fruits and strongest enemies. His claim to first choice was based on the promise of Moses, given at that time as a reward for his bravery and faithfulness in trying to persuade the people to enter the Promised Land, notwithstanding the giants. In this request, Caleb, at eighty-five years of age, showed himself again most brave and stalwart, for the giants were still there and must be dispossessed before he could enjoy his portion. His desire for Hebron, and his willingness to battle for it, were both strengthened, no doubt, by the fact that his most illustrious ancestors and relatives were buried there, Abraham and Sara, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah.

Illustration and Application

The story of Caleb teaches the young how to grow old, and the old how to stay young. In order to have a good boy, you must begin with his grandfather, and in order to have a good grandfather, you must begin on him as a boy. Heredity is mighty, but training and character are mightier still. This Caleb was not a born Jew, but a Kenizzite, descended from Esau. His faith in God and training in the household of faith as an adopted son, had so checkmated his bad blood that the mighty tribe of Judah had made him their chief. Forty years before, in the spying out of the land, he had even been chief of one of the two scouting parties made up of princes from all the tribes. He was one of those hopeful, cheery, courageous men that are recognized as born leaders, of whatever race they come. Around such men the people gather as about a spring, and the spring in such lives never dries up. Ruskin, George MacDonald and Edward Eggleston all declared, independently, that the one common trait of the world's leaders is the retention of the freshness and feeling of childhood in the maturity of manhood. The man for whom the people thirst is one who combines enthusiasm with wisdom; whose eyes burn as a flame of fire beneath hair as white as snow. The children and youth of our Sunday Schools should be taught to preserve their hope and zeal and courage while adding the wisdom of age. And the aged (who should be studying these lessons under the home department, if they cannot get to the Sunday School itself) should renew their youth, if they have lost it out of their hearts, by quickening their faith in God. These are the two sides of the one great truth of this lesson as viewed, on the one hand, from the side of youth, on the other from the side of age.

The Bible abounds with grand old men. Noah was six hundred years old when he built the ark, and preached righteousness to a generation that only ridiculed his words. Abraham was eighty when he marshalled three hundred servants of his household, and recaptured Lot from the mighty chief Chedorlaomer, who had just defeated five chiefs of Sodom and vicinity. Moses at one hundred and twenty, when he completed his great task of leading Israel to the Land of Promise, testified that "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." And in the New Testament we see the apostle John, a hundred years old, still a "son of thunder," full of light and life, battling for Christ against principalities and powers that cannot, even by exile to the mines of Patmos, blot out his faith, and hope, and love. The time would fall us to speak of Hannah, and Simeon, and "Paul, the aged," all of whom illustrated how beautiful and fruitful life's autumn may be.

And that brings us to speak of Nature as illustrating how life can be renewed. An aged Christian should be like an orange tree, on which, with ripe "apples of gold," are new blossoms and growing fruit. A Christian may "retire" from business, but never from fruitful activity. The worm retires into the cocoon only to take up a new and nobler form of life, suggesting that a man who has earned enough for selfish uses should turn his talents with equal energy into altruistic service. Caleb might have made the excuses that are common among old men who have lost heart and hope, and claim a right to throw up the fighting, and take an easy place. He chose mountain climbing instead, and that, too, where giants and fortresses blocked his way. The mountain air and outlook repay the struggle to reach them.

Thy thoughts and feelings shall not die,
Nor leave thee, when gray hairs are nigh,
A melancholy slave;
But an old age serene and bright,
And lovely as a Lapland night,
Shall lead thee to thy grave.

In Rose Porter's delightful little book, Summer Driftwood for the Winter Fire, an old man bids good-bye to his grandchild as she goes away on her vacation, and says to her, "Remember, little one, to gather the driftwood that will light the winter fire."

What is It Like in Common Life?

The child laughs, and says that she is going to have a good time; that she will bask in the sunshine and gather flowers and listen to the birds. "Ah, Annie," says the old man, "the flowers will fade, the sunshine be hidden when the winter storm-clouds come, and the song birds will grow silent. Find something lasting. Begin to gather wood now that will warm your heart when the winter of life comes, child."

Much is heard among Christians about the "dead line of fifty." But some beyond three score and ten are full of courageous zeal, like Ralph Wells, the "grand old man" of the Sunday School world, because full of confidence in Christ and wholehearted in devotion to God and man. The work of the preacher and teacher is pre-eminently to give life, like a river. When his own life becomes too feeble to vitalize others he has passed the "dead line" and should turn, not from his work, but to the fountain of life. One of our most prominent teachers, who knows and loves his country well, said recently that the most ominous feature of our social life, the one that caused him the most concern, was the growing lack of reverence for age, the incapacity to recognize the fact that wisdom is the characteristic of age, as energy is of youth.

Caleb illustrates the fact that godliness is profitable for this world as well as for that which is to come. There were giants to be conquered, forests to be cut down, but his strenuous manhood rejoiced in overcoming difficulties, knowing that his best efforts, with God's help, would carry him through, until at last the fruitful mountain and the verdant valleys about it would become his earthly Paradise, though to the last calling for arduous cultivation and courageous defense. It used to be thought that even a Protestant Christian life must be a sort of penance. "We should suspect some danger nigh when we possess delight," was a common sentiment. It is told of a pious Scotchman that he put cold water in his soup, saying, "Hot soup is too good for a poor sinner like me." A similar story is told of a deacon who called on Dr. Lyman Beecher when he had just set up housekeeping, and found a new carpet on the parsonage floor. With a chuckle, the deacon said, "D'y'e think you can have all that and heaven, too?" In early days Canaan was used almost altogether to illustrate heaven. Rather "the land flowing with milk and honey" illustrates that a manly, whole-hearted Christian life is a "heaven begun below."

Caleb's story has a message, also, for those who are living on the glory of their ancestry:

He—I can trace my ancestry back through nine generations. She—What else can you do?

Then he looked at her as if he wondered how far he had dropped.

This lesson affords a fascinating opportunity to study vital old men who have been full of life and growth and fruit, when many others of their years have "gone to seed." A young-old preacher told his audience how Alexander the Great, at thirty-two, conquered the world with only 32,000 infantry and 5,000 cavalry, all of them old men, officers who were sixty years old, soldiers who were fifty years old, who had fought under Philip of Macedon. It should also be remembered that many of them were born in the army, and had been trained to soldiering from infancy. "Come, sixty-years-old officers! Come, fifty-years-old private soldiers!" exclaimed the old preacher, "fall into line. You will soon find a phalanx of young men at your heels. Don't be ashamed to follow the young Alexander of thirty-two, if you can find him." Michael Angelo is a noble sample of enthusiastic activity in what would usually be called old age. From his completion of the Sistine Chapel at thirty-nine he went on for fifty years of great work as sculptor, painter, architect, engineer and poet. He was seventy-seven when he painted "The Last Judgment," and from seventy-two to eighty-eight was building St. Peter's. Among those who have continued the active duties of life vigorously beyond the three score years and ten, may be mentioned Cato, Plutarch, Gladstone, Bismarck, Von Moltke, Lord Roberts; Senators Dawes, Cameron, Morrill, Thurman, Palmer, Evarts; also, David Dudley Field, Justice Field, Mark Hopkins, Professor Dana, Parke Goodwin, Verdi, Mommsen, Curtius, Leon Say, Crispien, Commodore Vanderbilt, Bessemer, Pope Leo XIII., Emperor William I. of Germany, Queen Victoria of England, Dr. R. W. McAll; Bishops Cox, Huntington and Clark; Horatius Bonar, Theodore L. Cuyler, Judge Story, Sir Henry Parke, Sir James Bacon, Dr. William Salmon, James Martineau and Julia Ward Howe.

John Eliot, on the day of his death, in his eightieth year, was found teaching the alphabet to an Indian child at his bedside. "Why not rest from your labors?" said a friend. "Because I have prayed to God to make me useful in my sphere, and he has heard my prayer; for now that I can no longer preach, he leaves me strength enough to teach this poor child his alphabet." Eighty years of age, and bedridden! Who, after this, can plead inability to do good! In the words of Philip James Bailey, author of Festus, who has just died:

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels noblest, acts the best.

REV. P. S. HENSON

Strange to say, there is not a single church in its whole length, nor, with the exception of a branch of the Y.M.C.A. at the corner of Broome street, another distinctly religious institution. In the great battle for civic righteousness in New York, the Bowery is the most valuable strategic point. Nowhere in any city is there such a vast number of men massed together for good or evil, as in the lodging-houses and hotels that stretch from Brooklyn Bridge to Cooper Union. And these men, many of them are not down in the gutter, nor ever have been. Doubtless a large number are on the way there, living dissipated and sometimes exceedingly degraded lives; but the great majority are able-bodied, keen-minded, wage-earning men. Alas, for the fact, the great mass of them are utterly out of touch with the church.

The lives of these men are so monotonous and weary, that one of the first agencies employed for the double purpose of relieving this dreariness, and of bringing them within the doors of the Mission, was music. A week-

Answers to Question of the Week

Are stores in large cities in which a large number of trades are combined, conducive to the public prosperity, or do they increase the number of wage-earners by reducing the number of traders, eventually eliminating the middle class?

Not an Ultimate Benefit

Temporarily, they benefit society at large by reducing cost in handling, etc.; finally, the result of such combinations is a general trust, powerful enough to smother all competition, under which prices are advancing to, or beyond the former level. As all other kinds of business are organizing on the same lines, the result can be but one—the impoverishment of the dependent classes. Cheapness of production and handling, is not in itself necessarily a benefit to society in general.

WILLIAM W. CASE.

They Eliminate the Small Dealers

Stores which combine a great variety of trades, in other words, department stores, are a great convenience to the general public, but they tend to increase the number of clerks, rather than trades. The small dealers are thus eliminated. It doubtless makes more millionaires and less moderately wealthy people. It is hard to decide which is really best. It encourages, we think, the trust principle, the monopoly system. But as it is generally satisfactory to the public, it will doubtless be continued. SARAH A. FALL.

They are a Commercial Necessity

Department stores are an absolute commercial necessity, meeting a strong and legitimate demand in this busy age for comfort, convenience and expedition in shopping. By economy of management and operation, such as is only possible in large concerns, goods are made, bought and sold in immense quantities and at lower prices than otherwise possible. The inevitable tendency of such establishments is to eliminate and absorb the middlemen. Their large pay-rolls include many clerks and managers who otherwise would run small independent shops, but the resulting benefits to the general public are incalculable, and the competition between the department stores themselves, will forever prevent monopoly of trade.

WALTER W. HUBBARD.

The Dark Side of the Subject

They increase the number of wage-earners, but at so miserably poor a rate of pay that if they did not exist, many would embark in a small business, much more remunerative than their positions in department stores. Their methods are destructive to all classes of retail mercantile business. Many children and unmarried people are employed, but if such stores did not exist, these persons might have a chance to build up a business for themselves, and to marry. While such stores sell cheap, which is desirable for the poor, particularly, everybody would be better off if the stores had never existed.

MARY E. BLASE.

They Increase the Army of Unemployed

They are not "conducive to the public prosperity." They are a menace, and create widespread dissatisfaction. They may be pleasing to the shoppers, who like to go where many things are gotten at the one place, and thus be more convenient for housekeepers and shoppers. They greatly reduce the number of traders, and increase the number of idle ones, who are perfectly capable of earning their living, and would, were they given the opportunity. The mammoth department store indirectly increases largely the number of idle men and women. Every one should be given an opportunity to earn an honest living.

A. D. MEARES.

They Help Public Prosperity

Department stores, so called, are "conducive to the public prosperity," by cheapening the cost of commodities of general consumption. This admitted fact proves them a public benefit. It is true, that small tradesmen cannot compete with them, and are driven out of business and compelled to become wage-earners, while the department stores pay the smallest possible wages to their employees; but, as society is now constituted, the great majority of people must buy as cheaply as they can, and even the small tradesman finds his compensation in a permanent income and reduced cost of living. JOHN G. OSBORN.

Preserve the "Middle Class"

One of the greatest evils which may befall any country, is the eliminating, in even the slightest degree, of the middle class of people. This class is the backbone of the country, whether in times of peace or of war. We find them, on an average, superior to the higher class of wealthy citizens in intelligence, though lacking the many advantages which are open to the latter. We find them to be students of human nature, which they come in contact with daily, and therefore most highly educated. As the employment of a great many wage-earners in a single store has a tendency to decrease the middle class, it is of injurious results to any city.

RUBY L. BURNS.

An Outgrowth of Public Necessity

The department stores of to-day, as they exist in our large cities, are simply filling a public need, and are a necessary part of our present civilization. In them, under one roof, shoppers can supply all their needs without the annoyance (sometimes very great to lady shoppers) of passing from store to store along crowded streets. In them, too, can generally be found a greater variety to select from; and when we consider the fact that prices are generally lower than in the small stores, it is safe to say that they are conducive to the public prosperity. Employment is thus given to a greater number than otherwise. Smaller dealers often find remunerative employment as heads of departments in the large stores.

Miscellaneous Questions

D. S., Phillips, Me. From which of the Greek poets did Paul quote the line, "For we are his offspring," in Acts 17: 28?

Probably from Aratus, who was a native of Cilicia, and therefore a fellow-countryman of Paul. A similar line occurs also in a hymn to Jupiter, written by Cleanthes, an earlier poet. Plato and Plutarch both have words to the same effect, but it is Aratus who uses the exact words quoted by Paul. The apostle adopted the wise course of quoting from writers in whom his hearers had confidence. In addressing Jews, he quoted the Hebrew prophets; in addressing Greeks, he quoted Greek poets.

E. L. S., Denver, Colo. Is sanctification an instantaneous act or a process extending through life? If the latter, how do you explain Rom. 6: 6, which speaks of the body of sin being destroyed?

Some theologians teach that sanctification may be obtained by a distinct act of the Holy Spirit, which may be instantaneous. The majority, however, hold that it is a lifelong process, beginning at conversion. Even these, however, admit that there are periods when the process is accelerated, and that under discipline, or under deep teaching, or during close communion with God, more progress may be made in an hour than during previous years. It would be dangerous ever to regard the process as complete, because that would discourage a person from striving after higher attainments. The passage you quote, as also the next verse, teaches the deliverance from the bondage of sin, which occurs at conversion. Henceforward the converted man is not in harmony with sin, but is opposed to it and struggles against it. The ally which temptation previously found within him—the body of sin—is destroyed, and if, as too often people, using their surnames, their sons would be called Wetten.

H. P. C., Nebraska, Ind. What caused the death of Martin Luther? or did he die a natural death? When did he die and where is he buried?

He was a sick man from a complication of diseases for fourteen years before he died, hard work, great cares, and frequent exposure to inclement weather having broken down the strong constitution. He preached in the Church of St. Andrew in Eisleben on February 14, 1546. He had gone to Eisleben to attempt a conciliation between the courts of Mansfeldt. February 17 he took to bed. Jonas, Martin and Paul, his sons, and two servants, watched by his bedside, and Count Albert sent for his own physicians, but without avail. He died at 4 A.M. February 18. His body was taken to Wittenberg, and interred in front of the pulpit in the Castle Church.

E. B., Elliston, O. Supposing a man runs in debt through card-playing, is it required of him, after his conversion, that he should pay these debts or not?

This can be answered in two ways: 1. The law regards a gambling debt as an illegal debt and uncollectable. 2. One who is sensitive on a point of personal honor, if able to do so, would pay such a debt, and never touch cards again.

C. A. W., Ashland, O. Is the Christian boy or girl on a farm or in a factory, whose earnings barely suffice for necessities, bound by the law of God to give one-tenth to the church?

The Christian is not under the law, but under grace. There is no command in the New Testament that he should give one-tenth of his income to the Lord's cause. Paul directed his converts to give as God had prospered them, but he did not say what proportion. To some Christians, one-tenth of their gross income would be a grievous bur-happens, the man does fall into sin, he mourns over it, repents of it, and avoids it in the future. Before his conversion he was a willing servant of sin, afterwards he hates it and resists it.

Will H. D. Harmon send his address to this office?

S. A. B., Gardner, Mass. 1. When, where and by whom was George Washington's birthday first celebrated as a day of national importance? 2. Has it ever been made by statute a national holiday? 3. Has Thanksgiving been made such?

1. In an inn in New York City, Feb. 22, 1783, a number of gentlemen met to celebrate General Washington's birthday, as a day of great importance to our country, and a fit occasion for national rejoicing and patriotic speeches. 2. No. No holiday that we have is such by federal law, not even the Fourth of July. 3. Thanksgiving Day is by Presidential appointment, but it is a legal holiday only in States making statutory provision for it. The Fifty-third Congress passed an act making Labor Day a public holiday in the District of Columbia; but, with this exception, has limited its functions to the appointment at different times of special holidays.

J. W. O., Lynchburg, Va. The papers stated not long since that a certain person would erect a residence in New York at a cost of $2,500,000. Now has a person the moral right to make such an expenditure as this on one's self? Such a costly residence is unnecessary to one's best comfort and development. Does it not show a selfish, narrow-minded nature, and that the heart is set on the things of the world and not on things above? In this age of Christian light, such an expenditure is a sin and an abomination in the sight of God?

It is quite possible that fuller acquaintance with the facts might put the matter in a very different light. We are all too prone to hasty condemnation. At the same time, if the case be simply one of indulgence in personal extravagance and vanity, it shows a profound misappreciation of advantages and neglect of opportunities.

C. E. G., Corona, Ill. What is King Edward's family name.

The family name of his father, Prince Albert, was Wettin; Queen Victoria was a Guelph. If his parents had been ordinary den, while to others it would be quite inadequate. The principles of Christianity are not hard and fast laws, but a reliance on the love and gratitude of the soul.

J. G., Prompton, Pa. Do the laws of God prohibit the marriage of a deceased wife's sister, or of a deceased brother's widow?

The question has been long debated. The only passage, so far as we know, urged in support of the prohibition is Lev. 18: 18; but that is apparently a prohibition of the bigamous marriage with a living wife's sister. The Talmudists, who, it may be assumed, understood the law, declared that the law did not oppose, but rather encouraged such unions. The contention against the marriages arises, of course, from the view that the relations of the wife become the relations of the husband, and that her sister is virtually his sister. So far as the law stands, however, there seems to be no explicit prohibition nor any command which can logically be construed into prohibition.

T. S., Waupun, Wis. 1. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently, there was a description of excavations in Palestine, and it seemed as if the excavator had to give his findings to the Turkish Government. How is this? 2. Do these excavators get paid, and how, or by whom? 3. Can you tell me where to buy some books about excavations?

1. The Turkish Government grants a firman or permit, but reserves the right to retain whatever may be found by the excavators. Turkey, however, has always acted generously in such cases. It presented the Babylon brick library to Hilprecht, entire. 2. They are engaged and paid by the Palestine Exploration Fund. 3. Write to Scribner's or Harper's, New York.

Mrs. Helen, A. R., Waterford, Wis. The adoption of the Morning Glory, as our national flower, would be most appropriate, as, in many ways, it is typical of our national career. Wherever the graceful vine takes root, it quickly reaches the top of its support—even as this young nation has already climbed to heights of grandeur and renown. Then sending out its tendrils in every direction, as if seeking further growth and expansion, as the United States is doing to-day. Then come a profusion of beautiful flowers, and behold! our national colors—the red, white and blue—painted by nature's hand.

MRS. GOLDING'S BONNET*

By J. DEANE HILTON

WE all felt very sorry for Mrs. Golding. You must know that she was left a widow suddenly, and being so unworldly, so entirely incapable of fending for herself, every one was disposed to help her. Her husband, George Maxwell Golding, had been an artist, with a great deal more talent than industry and frugality; when he died he left his wife totally unprovided for. The people of our suburb are somewhat inclined to ostentation, they like to make out that their incomes are larger, and their family connections grander than they really are; they are also guilty of various other little weaknesses and meanesses—very much like the denizens of other select suburbs. But with all their faults they are not lacking in human sympathy. I am thankful to say. Our friend, Mrs. Golding, had no resources, no relatives who were disposed to assist her. Her husband's sister, Mrs. Mortimer, was well-to-do, but showed no eagerness to fly to the assistance of her relative. I fancied there was an estrangement, but was not sure. Our rector, the Rev. Barnabas Truslove, M.A., has his hands pretty full, but he can generally be relied upon to assist any one in trouble. He it was who suggested starting a fund to pay the rent of Mrs. Golding's tiny house, and to keep her going until she was able to support herself by giving lessons in music, and typing. The clergyman managed the affair with his usual delicacy. The subscriptions were anonymous, and the widow never knew who were helping her and who were not. I believe Mr. Alfred Cowley, the Bohemian, was a subscriber, although he never owned to it. Mrs. Golding, by-the-by, was a bright little woman, with light brown hair, blue eyes, and a trim figure. She looked about five and twenty—Matilda says five and thirty, but that is absurd. No matter what she wore, she always seemed to me to look a lady. Matilda said she was one of those women "who pay for dressing," whatever that may mean. Of course she could not afford a servant; but if you looked in upon her at any time, her small house was always beautifully neat and clean. I fancy she used to get up very early in the morning to do the steps before any of the neighbors' servants were stirring. In my opinion, she would have made a much better wife for one of our young men than any of those harum-scarum, golfing and tennis-playing girls who get so much attention. But young men have a silly prejudice against widows, and then Mrs. Golding never gave the least encouragement to admirers. I don't believe the possibility of changing her condition ever entered her head. We were among the subscribers, of course. Matilda said I was wickedly munificent, also that I would not have given half as much if Mrs. Golding had been old and plain. But Matilda rarely misses a chance of making me feel my own unworthiness. The rector had his own ideas about charity; very sound ideas, I admit. He held that it was a sin to assist the idle and the drunken. I wish he was a statesman. He arranged the subscriptions on a sliding scale, so to speak. Mrs. Golding made no secret of her financial condition: as her earnings increased, so our subscriptions diminished. This was as it should be, and no one had any objection to make. If Mr. Truslove had not broken down from the effects of over-work, and gone away to the south of France, leaving that gawky curate, Davidson, in charge, everything would have gone smoothly. Poor little Emily Golding! She was not a first-class pianist, she held no certificates, her pupils were few and not very remunerative. How could she hope to compete with Miss Florelli, L.R.A.M., the brilliant professional? And as for her typing!—well, I don't wish to be uncharitable, but the "copy" I let her have to type came back sadly mangled. Her machine was a cheap one, and was subject to attacks of nervous debility; moreover, she was a very slow operator. I really found it impossible to use the work she sent in, though, of course, I said nothing to Matilda. The world is cruelly hard upon little women like Emily Golding, who have never learned to earn their own living. I don't see why they should be obliged to; a few chivalrous, wealthy young fellows might give up their expensive cigars and their whiskies and sodas, and hand the proceeds of their self-sacrifice to unprotected young females; but this is ridiculous optimism.

A smart bonnet is a very small thing—it was a very small thing—but what dreadful consequences it may bring in its train! I myself have had some bitter experiences of such trifles, if I dared to speak. Mrs. Golding appeared at church one Sunday morning in a new bonnet, and very charming she looked in it. You can hardly imagine the amount of talk this bonnet—or was it a hat? I am not sure which—caused. Matilda came home full of it; she didn't say a single word about the sermon. She declared the thing must have cost a couple of guineas at the very least, and more than that, she said Mrs. Golding had assumed the article of finery with the express purpose of attracting the attention of the curate. Matilda was eloquent; people who were the recipients of charity, she urged, had no business with such luxuries as bonnets which she herself would hesitate to purchase. Then the children wanted this, that, and the other, and in short, I, the father of the family, would be guilty of gross social and financial immorality if I continued my subscription. What could I do? Matilda always has her own way, and when the curate called about the subscription, she saw him and settled the matter. Mrs. Skate, the notorious busy-body and gossip, called soon after, and made Matilda a great deal worse. Mrs. Skate tore the little widow's character to shreds. She was certain that Mrs. Golding's dress was new as well as her bonnet. Her servant had seen a cardboard box which the dustman had collected from Mrs. Golding's house, and it bore the name of a fashionable dressmaker in the West End. The ladies declared they were shocked and upset, and all that, but it seemed to me that the news acted upon their spirits like a tonic. Mrs. Skate paid calls at nearly every house in the suburb, and owing to her assiduous labors, poor Mrs. Golding's subscription list was reduced to a mere skeleton. These good, charitable souls never thought of asking Mrs. Golding for an explanation. Why should they? What defense could she make?

I never at any time had the privilege of being in the widow's confidence. I don't know what her feelings were, but I think she must have suffered a good deal about this time. It must have been very unpleasant for her, when ladies, with whom she had been on friendly terms, passed her in the street with a cold nod or a rude stare. I used to hear her wheezy old piano being thumped sometimes, when I passed her house in the afternoons, and I wondered how she was getting on.

Once, when Matilda and I had been up in town to attend the private view of the Royal Institute, we passed Mrs. Golding near the station where the shops are. She did not see us. Matilda would have it that she had been in to Cohen's, the big jeweller's and pawnbroker's, to buy some article of adornment. "How she can have the face to behave so, I can't imagine," said the indignant Matilda. I said nothing, having other matters to think of just then.

The summer left us early that year. October was quite winterly. I had seen Mrs. Golding from my study window, passing along the road, and it seemed to me that she was thinly clad and rather shabby; she walked, too, with her fair head bowed. She had not worn the offending bonnet for a long time. It began to be whispered that her pupils, the few she had, were leaving her one by one. I know the typewriter went wrong beyond the hope of repair, and I could give her no more work. She suggested copying by hand; but, alas! her writing was worse than mine, which is saying much. The ladies said she was being rightly served for her extravagance and folly, to give it no worse name. Perhaps she was. I thought the ladies ought to know. When I chanced to meet Mrs. Golding one day, I noticed that her look of brightness had faded; she walked slowly, languidly, and seemed to be in low spirits. She regarded me in a rather startled way, I thought, when I spoke to her. I really felt very sorry for the poor little woman. I know I am clumsy and awkward—Matilda says stupid—but I put it as delicately as I could. I asked her if she were not in straitened circumstances, and could I do anything for her?

"Oh, no, Mr. Baker," she said, with a laugh that sounded a little forced, "I want for nothing. I have my pupils, you know, and when I let the rooms I shall do very well."

"What rooms, may I ask?"

"My upper rooms. I don't want them; you know, I am all by myself. If you went into her little house, which was all dark and silent.

I supposed from what she said about being provided for, that her well-to-do relative had promised to help her. I never thought—

Some days later, the milkman told our maid that he had taken upon himself to ask the doctor to call upon Mrs. Golding, who had fallen ill. It must have been true, for we saw Dr. Buchan's carriage draw up at the house more than once. Then one morning the doctor did not come, and all the blinds of the little house were pulled down.

I was going across to make inquiries, when I met Mr. Davidson, the gawky curate. He was tall and pale, and not very polished in his manner. Shallow observers underestimated Mr. Davidson. I was a shallow observer. He was passing me by should happen to hear of any lady who wants lodgings, you will think of me, won't you? The house is a pleasant one to live in."

Still she waited, and seemed anxious to say something more. "You have been very kind, Mr. Baker," she said, "I wish you would tell me something. I want to know why——"

"Well, my dear?" I am old enough to call a woman of that age, my dear.

"Why are all the people so different from what they used to be? You know how kind they were at first."

She made a pause. It was growing dark, and I am dreadfully short-sighted, but I fancied she was crying. I hardly knew how to answer her. I did not like to speak out plainly about that bonnet. "You see, Mrs. Golding," I said, "ladies are inclined to be censorious. I believe some of them wondered how you could afford to dress so well——" I stopped.

"Thank you," she said quietly, "I understand. Perhaps they would be sorry if they knew. I have had to bear such humiliations, Mr. Baker. But it does not matter now. I believe I shall be provided for. I have hope of brighter days. Good-bye."

She turned away, and broke down very badly. I could hear her sobbing as she with a brief salutation, but I stopped him, and asked for news of Mrs. Golding.

"Do you know, Mr. Baker," he said, looking at me very sternly, "that that poor woman has been slowly starved to death? Yes, sir, starved. God forgive us all!"

Mr. Davidson is not a young man given to sentiment, but his face worked, and the tears fell from his eyes as he spoke.

"Impossible!" I exclaimed, "Why, I met her only the other day, and she made no complaint."

"Very likely, sir; Mrs. Golding was not in the habit of making complaints. She kept her secret bravely to the end—she had sold or pawned nearly everything she possessed; but I think, Mr. Baker, some of us Christian people might have tried a little harder to find it out. Not that I am less blameworthy than the others. I am afraid, sir, that certain evil-speaking women have worked great mischief. I trust we shall all profit by this lesson. Good morning."

Mr. Davidson strode away at a great pace. I went indoors, feeling as if I had been whipped. There was no getting away from the curate's condemnation. His words had cut me.

* * *

That afternoon Mrs. Mortimer called upon us. She drove up in a grand carriage. Though not a very refined woman, she was good-hearted, I believe, for she cried as she talked, without any attempt at disguise. "Poor, dear Emily," she said, "she was so awkward to get on with. I would have sent her money, if she had only asked; but Emily's notions were peculiar—she never would ask for help. I did send her a few things to wear, though with fear and trembling—you could never tell how she would take benefits. I had no further use for them, and was only too glad to let her have them."

I looked across at Matilda, and she understood.

"That bonnet with the French silk flowers?" said Matilda, in a faint voice.

"Yes," said Mrs. Mortimer, "that is the one I bought in Paris. I am glad she had sense enough to wear it. I assure you, Mrs. Baker, I had only worn it three times."

Mrs. Mortimer looked astonished, as well she might, for at this point Matilda began to cry with passionate abandon. In fact, I have not seen her so moved since—well, this is not the place to make reference to our family bereavements. Matilda is good-hearted in the main, and is generous to a fault sometimes, but she is always at the mercy of the first scandal-monger that comes along.

When Mr. Truslove came back, quite strong and vigorous after his long rest, the curate told him everything that had happened during his absence. The next Sunday, when he gave out the text, we could all see that something was weighing heavily upon his mind. Mr. Truslove had not much reputation for eloquence. People said that he was an excellent parish priest, but rather a failure in the pulpit. I express no opinion upon the matter, neither will I venture to criticize this particular sermon. I only note the effect it produced. He preached upon charity, charity which thinketh no evil, which suffereth long and is kind. The effect of his eloquence was that nearly every woman in the church had her handkerchief out, and if some of them did not feel bitterly remorseful and heartily ashamed of themselves, I am the more mistaken.

And when poor little Emily Golding was laid to rest beside her husband, you should have seen the pile of wreaths and crosses that covered her grave! The money that was lavished upon flowers would have kept the widow in affluence for a twelve-month. Alas and alas!—what was the use of it all. It seemed to me an ironical compliment.

NEGLECTED INVITATIONS*

The Penalty of Ignoring the Offers of Spiritual Blessings

UNDER republican institutions, we do not fully realize all that is implied in the parable associated with the Topic. The king who invited people to join in celebrating the marriage of his son, had the right to assume that his invitation would be appreciated. In monarchical lands an invitation from the monarch is a high honor, which takes precedence of all other engagements, and would not be willingly declined. In the case quoted, there was also the additional factor that the invitation had apparently been accepted. In Oriental lands it is the custom, in celebrations of so much importance as a marriage of a member of the royal family, to issue the invitations a long time ahead of the occasion, and to send a reminder on the appointed day to the guests who had promised to attend. It was this reminder that was treated with scorn by the persons who had accepted the first invitation. It was, therefore, a studied insult for them to go to their business without even the attempt at an excuse, and it was additional contumely when the servants of the king were put to death. No Oriental king would submit to such treatment.

Primarily the parable was intended as a reproof to the Jews, who, as the chosen people of God, were invited by their prophets and at last by Christ himself, representing God, to partake of the blessings of Christ's kingdom. But now the invitation has been extended to the Gentiles, and again we see in individuals the same conduct that the Jews manifested as a nation. When the preacher utters the invitation now, there are many so engrossed in the affairs of this life, that they pay no attention to it. Even in church, their thoughts are in the store or on the farm, and they show no disposition to accept the offer of the Gospel. They do not resist it, they are not among the other class, typified by those who slew the king's servants, but they ignore it. There is something very contemptuous in such conduct, which God is sure to punish. Indeed, it punishes itself. If a man was in a burning house and a fireman aroused him, told him that the house was on fire, and showed him how to reach the ladder, that would be a means of safety; the man might not quarrel with the fireman, he need only ignore his warning and stay where he is, in order to lose his life. If he is in a boat drifting toward the rapids, and a friend, at the risk of his life, puts out in a boat to rescue him, he need only pay no heed to his rescuer to insure his own destruction. More souls have been lost by negligence than by any other means. The farm and the merchandize claim the first attention, and they too often have it.

Bunyan's picture of the man with the rake, who is so intent on the straws and sticks he is gathering, that he pays no attention to the angel who is offering him a gold crown, is a type of many. Even the Christian, who has pledged himself to the Lord, is in that attitude, if he becomes so engrossed with business or pleasure that he does not seek the higher blessings that God offers to his children. God has treasures of grace, experiences of light and knowledge, heights of faith and devotion, that can be gained only by those who leave themselves free to strive for them. If the mind becomes so fully occupied with worldly matters, that there is no effort to gain possession of this inheritance that God has provided for his children, the loss is their own. They neglect the invitation, and they miss the blessing they might enjoy; still more serious is it that their usefulness is restricted, and the world misses the light that their lives would otherwise shed on its darkness.

In our time, the other class, those who openly resist and persecute Christ's messengers, is not so numerous, but even this class is represented among us. It does not necessarily involve physical violence. There are ways of killing the servants of God that do not include actual murder. Ridicule, abuse, misrepresentation, slanderous charges, have time and again been used to destroy the influence of men whose usefulness has been great in the churches. There is always need of watchfulness, lest in giving ear to such slanders we co-operate with those murderers, who, while they leave the messenger of God alive in the body, kill his spiritual influence, which is worse. Many a pastor has been driven from his pulpit by the machinations of men who became uncomfortable under the message he was sent to deliver. God permits it, we know not why; but there will surely come a day of reckoning, when his servants will be vindicated.

A Luncheon Chat with General Booth

THE SALVATION ARMY'S FOUNDER TELLS OF HIS WORK AND HIS ASPIRATIONS

BRONZED, graybearded, and scarcely showing a trace of fatigue after his ocean voyage, and after the thunderous welcome that had greeted him down New York Bay in the morning, Gen. William Booth, the septuagenarian founder and commander of the Salvation Army, sat at the head of a luncheon table at the Army headquarters in New York on October 4. Around him were grouped several notable guests, including the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott of New York, Melville D. Stone of Chicago, Rev. Dr. Josiah Strong of the Social Service League; Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; Consul Booth Tucker, and Commander Booth Tucker.

It was a little, simple luncheon of welcome, wholly informal. Cordial greetings were exchanged, and the conversation became general and took a wide range. Dr. Klopsch inquired of Gen. Booth whether drunkenness was on the increase in England.

The General replied that there was less of the evil now than in former generations, when even clergymen were at liberty to have wine, beer and liquor. The ministry fortunately has now been emancipated from such practices. Besides, there was less drunkenness generally.

Gen. Booth said he considered tobacco the worst enemy the Christian church had to deal with. It led to drink. He thought pretty much everybody that smoked, drank also.

Gen. Booth then explained at considerable length the economic plans of the Salvation Army in England. He said he had found that "the waste supplies the want," that is, the material thrown away by the affluent and well-to-do, could be utilized to supply the needs of the poor.

Illustrating, he said that the Army had a home for men who were moral and physical wrecks, and it had an average of 250 inmates, "whom we house, work, feed and sleep," there at an aggregate expense of £250 sterling, or $5 each per year, or 10 cents per week. The same number of men in the almshouse would cost the country 14 shillings ($3.50) each per week, or about $45,000 a year.

Commandant Booth-Tucker here remarked, apropos of the utilization of the waste, that he had, in Greater New York, five stations for the collection of waste. Twenty wagons called for it daily. The sales in one year from that source amounted to $150,000.

Gen. Booth said there were on this earth really two different worlds—the one a secular world, the other, the world of "church people." The one knows very little of the other—hardly knows how it lives or what it does. The one says to the poor man, "Wash your shirt!" while the latter believes that if he will first get his heart washed he will have no trouble whatever about a clean shirt.

Professor Strong said that the year 1895 was a time of great financial depression in this country. Such times necessarily develop the inventive genius of our people, since they force them to greater economy. In those days, they learned how to employ the waste to such an extent that the waste, worked up, resulted in by-products that sometimes were far more valuable than the main thing itself. So the Salvation Army has learned how to utilize the waste of human society, and frequently the by-product is more important and better for human kind than the main product.

Gen. Booth, by this time, had warmed up to the themes under discussion. His tall, attenuated but muscular, frame seemed to take on new energy, and his eyes brightened as he spoke to his guests, addressing his remarks to each in turn, in his strong, deep tones.

"We had a woman—a fallen woman," he said, "in one of our Rescue Homes. She was one of Mrs. Bramwell Booth's girls. She was saved, went to work, and every month she came in and paid us six shillings, to compensate us for her share of the expense to which we were put at the time she was saved. Just think of that! If the world were only to set to work to save these girls—these men and women—with the same energy with which they set to work to make steel and iron machines, they would get enough money out of these people to pay three and a-half, four, and even five per cent. on the investment."

With these and many similar incidents of his experience, the General entertained his listeners.

Mr. Melville D. Stone, speaking of intemperance, referred to the Washingtonian movement which swept over this country many years ago like a cyclone, and which brought our people face to face with the tremendous evils of intemperance. We need some such experience for the younger generation.

General Booth, in further conversation, explained the character of the Salvation Army's work among children, drunkards and fallen women. When the General first started the organization, half a century ago, it was his purpose to make it an adjunct to the church, and not a separate body. He asked the Episcopal Church to "mother" the new movement. The Episcopal Church would have nothing to do with it. Then he went to the Methodist Church, but was received there with equal indifference; he could find no one willing to listen to him. He was literally compelled to start the movement on an independent footing of its own outside of the churches, since none would own it. His intention, which was to have founded a society within the domain of the Episcopal or Methodist Church, was defeated by the attitude of the churches themselves. In rejecting the newly-fledged organization, they turned out one of the mightiest agencies of modern times for reaching the common people.

As an illustration of the early work of the Salvation Army, Gen. Booth relates that at a large meeting at which over a thousand persons were present, an Episcopal minister asked how many of the audience had been brought to Christ. Eight hundred raised their hands.

"And how many of you," persisted the preacher, "have been brought to Christ through the Salvation Army?"

For answer, over five hundred raised their hands. The proof of the efficiency of the Salvation Army was conclusive, and no more questions were asked.

FOOLED HIM.

But in the Pleasant Ways of Peace.

Good thing some men are married. Their wives keep a sensible watch over them, and have a way to help overcome their troubles.

Mr. E. Lewis, of Shaniko, Ore., was located for several years at various points in South America, and fell into the natural custom of frequently drinking coffee. He says: "I took to using it the same as those nervous, excitable people in South and Central America. They make very black coffee and it becomes more or less an intoxicating beverage. At the end of about four months, I began having severe sick headaches and nervousness, but supposed it was from the tropical sun. At last my wife became alarmed at my headaches and stomach trouble. She tried to induce me to quit drinking coffee, laying my trouble to that, but I continued to use it."

She read of Postum Food Coffee, and ordered some from the States, but kept it a secret from me. The very first time she made it, when I came in for my coffee and roll, I noticed that peculiar, pleasant flavor of Postum, and asked her what it was. She said it was a new brand of coffee and asked me how I liked it. I tried two cups of it with rich 'Leche-de-Cheua,' which is used by everyone as milk in Panama, and thought it excellent. After a couple of days my headaches stopped, and in a short while my nervousness disappeared as if by magic. I have been using nothing but Postum for the past year, and have been completely relieved, and my wife has also been relieved of constipation by changing to Postum, and we shall never go back to coffee again."

CORNISH

AMERICAN PIANO FOR

$155.00 AND UP

YEAR'S TRIAL FREE

You advance no money. We prepay the freight. You shoulder no risk. We guarantee satisfaction.

When you buy a CORNISH on the CORNISH PLAN you receive a piano—exquisite in tone, beautiful in finish, perfect in action—at factory price without dealers' profits added, and you buy it with the clear proviso that if you are not satisfied after 12 months' trial we will take it back. If, after the year's trial, you are not satisfied and send the piano back to us, we will refund to you the cost and the freight charges with interest at six per cent. If you purchase, we will do anything in reason in the matter of terms. We make and sell the Cornish Pianos on honor and we have made a happy friend of every one of our 250,000 customers. Our profits are small, and we depend wholly upon the enormous output of our factory to make it pay us. To support our agreement and to make it absolutely binding upon us, we give you when you purchase a piano what is practically a bond on the whole of our million dollar plant, and this not only guarantees our promise but also warrants the piano for 25 years.

All you need to do is to drop us a postal card request and we will send you our new souvenir catalogue, with all details and particulars about the instrument and our great offer. With the catalogue we will send a set of embossed miniature pianos and organs, also free, exactly like our goods, in colorings and designs, to aid you in making selection of just the instrument you want in your home.

Whether you want a high-priced or a low-priced piano, write to us and let us tell you all about what we have and how you can have a beautiful instrument on free trial for one year. If you wish to do a little work for us, we will tell you how you can get your piano without cost and how you can get a cash bonus for the first sale in a new community. Write at once. Mention this paper.

LESSON XXI.

REVIEW

1. How is the prefix com- or con- expressed? 2. In what position should two consonants be placed to express com- or con- intermediate? What other syllables are also expressed in the same way? 3. How are the prefixes inter-, magna-, self-, etc., represented? 4. By what sign is the prefix in- represented, and to what consonants is it prefixed? 5. When in- has a negative signification, how is it written?

Suffixes

180. The suffix -ing is expressed by the stroke u, and -ings by u; thus, fac- ing, facings, evening, moving, robing, borrowing, part- ings, feeling, paring, printing, counting.

181. When the stroke is not convenient, -ing is expressed by a light dot at the end of the word, and -ings by a light dash; thus, hoping, plotting, plottings, tying, turning, turnings, adjourning, morning, mornings, engraving, engravings, cleansing, dancing, airing, hatching, hoe- ing.

182. The suffixes -ality, -ility, -arity, etc., are expressed by disjoining the preceding stroke; thus, formality, carnality, geniality, venality, durability.

stability, barbarity, popularity, regularity, majority, minorities.

183. The sign u is employed as a contraction for -ment, when following u, ns, or a hook, when it will join easily; thus, imprisonment, resentment, commencement, payment, refinement, achievements.

184. The suffix -mental or -mentality is expressed by mut; thus, fundamental, regimental, instrumental or instrumentality, instrumentalities.

185. Generally -ly is expressed by l; thus, poorly, heavily, coarsely, nice, greatly. Where it is inconvenient to join the l it may be disjoined, thus, friendly, confidently, dis- tantly. It is sometimes easier to combine the ly with the preceding stroke by means of the initial hook; thus, deeply, actively.

186. The circle s is used to express -self and the large circle to denote -selves; thus, thy- self, it is sometimes joined, as in myself, himself, themselves.

187. To express -ship sh is used, as in stewardship. Sometimes the character may be joined; thus, friendship.

188. A disjoined u is used to express -fulness; thus, restfulness, careful- ness.

ness. A disjoined u is used for -lessness; thus, listlessness, lawlessness.

Exercise 61

1. facings, evening, moving, robing, borrowing, part- ings, feeling, paring, printing, counting.
2. hoping, plotting, plottings, tying, turning, turnings, adjourning, morning, mornings, engraving, engravings, cleansing, dancing, airing, hatching, hoe- ing.
3. formality, carnality, geniality, venality, durability, stability, barbarity, popularity, regularity, majority, minorities.
4. imprisonment, resentment, commencement, payment, refinement, achievements.
5. fundamental, regimental, instrumental, instrumentality, instrumentalities.
6. poorly, heavily, coarsely, nice, greatly.
7. friendly, confidently, dis- tantly.
8. deeply, actively.

Exercise 62

1. Weeping, webbing, eating, reading, etching, edging. 2. Hacking, juggling, thawing, terrifying, vying, thieving. 3. Erring, missing, noosing, letting, following, failing. 4. Branding, tending, accounting, puffing, driving. 5. Borings, borrowings, diggings, longings, livings. 6. Finality, brutality, nobility, singularity, minority. 7. Announcement, alignment, rudimental, sternly, vainly. 8. Oneself, ourselves. Write the full consonant forms in: herself, yourself, yourselves. 9. Hardship, leadership, thankfulness, hopelessness.

Exercise 63

1. A swaggering manner, coarse jocularity, and forced conviviality are not compatible with real affability and geniality of disposition. 2. Neither can admiration be felt for him who impudently or insolently forces himself and his views on our notice. 3. "Know thyself," was the advice of a wise man, but how few of us are discerning enough to see ourselves as others see us? 4. Did we but possess this valuable learning, we could censure the shortcomings of others without any show of resentment. 5. But such censorship would not be agreeable to all, and few would care to fearlessly exercise it. 6. "Self-deceit is the easiest of any," runs the proverb, and it is an indication of extreme youthfulness to boast effusively of one's championship in scholarship or in workmanship over others. 7. The uselessness of such boasting may appear apparent when tested. 8. Thus the heedlessness shown in indulging in it is exposed.

REVIEW

1. What are the signs for the suffixes -ing, -ings? 2. When is the stroke and when the dot employed? 3. How are the suffixes -ality, -ility, -arity, etc., expressed? 4. What sign is employed for -ment, and how are -mental and -mentality indicated? 5. What are the suffixes for -ly, -self, -selves, and -ship? 6. How are -fulness and -lessness expressed?

The student having advanced to this stage, is now advised to read some book printed in the Corresponding Style of shorthand, and we recommend for this purpose either of the following: Phonographic Reader or Select Readings No. 1, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand notes. Either of these works will be sent post-paid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orders should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XXII. will appear in the issue of Oct. 29.

The Children of the Mines

From President Mitchell's Statement

Involved in this fight are questions weightier than any question of dollars and cents. The present miner has had his day; he has been oppressed and ground down, but there is another generation coming up—a generation of little children, prematurely doomed to the whirl of the mill and the noise and blackness of the breakers. It is for these little children we are fighting. We have not underestimated the strength of our opponents; we have not overestimated our own power of resistance. Accustomed always to live upon a little, a little less is no unendurable hardship. It was with a quaking of hearts that we asked for our last pay envelopes; but in the grim and bruised hand of the miner was the little white hand of a child, a child like the children of the rich, and in the heart of the miner was the soul-rooted determination to starve to the last crust of bread and fight out the long, dreary battle, to win a life for the child and secure for it a place in the world in keeping with advanced civilization.

A Helping Hand for Strangers

Rev. George A. Hall, the Senior State Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York, desires us to call the attention of parents, teachers and guardians of young men, to the fact that the associations are anxious to get the names and addresses of young men, strangers in any city. By sending names and addresses of young men, upon their leaving home for a new place of residence, to the State Office, 156 Fifth Avenue, letters will at once inform some Christian young men in the place of their presence, and visits will be made, and every effort put forth to surround them with healthful influences.

Full of Instruction.

Mrs. J. A. E., Capon Road, Va., writes: "I don't want to fail to say of the sermons of Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, which are printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week. They certainly are wonderful sermons of instruction, and I shall ever prize them."

TRUE FOOD

Always Relieves Dyspepsia.

Wrong food brings penalties. A lady in Lone Tree, Okla., found this out. After suffering for years with dyspepsia, she says:

"Many times I could not eat anything; sometimes I drank a little hot milk, at other times the lightest food distressed me so that death would have been gladly welcomed as a relief. I was weak and listless and unable to work for want of strength.

Two years ago a dear friend earnestly recommended me to try Grape-Nuts, as she had found it a most valuable food. I commenced to use it immediately and the benefit I received in an incredibly short time was almost marvelous.

Words cannot express the joy and thankfulness I felt when I found I was relieved of that dreadful distress from indigestion that I had been experiencing after each meal.

After continued use, health and strength returned; I began to enjoy life and go among my friends again so much improved that remarks were made about my good health. I sleep well now, sit all day with perfect ease and comfort and sew and work as I like. I wish I could induce every sufferer from dyspepsia to use Grape-Nuts." OUR ORIENTAL VISITOR

SIAM'S Crown Prince, while the guest of this country, intends, it is said, to make a serious study of our ways and customs, and to write a book about America and things American as he sees them. It is also said that good use will be made of his observations in working out improvements in Siam.

Prince Chowfa Maha Vajiravudh is the son of a most progressive sovereign. Two steps which marked the first years of the reign of Chulalongkorn I., were the abrogation of the old custom of kneeling and crawling in the presence of the king, and the abolition of slavery. Schools, railroads and other features of Occidental civilization have been greatly encouraged by him; and he has been particularly kind to Christian missionaries. The missionary, M. L. Cort, dedicated his book on Siam to him as the "wisest and best ruler this kingdom has ever known." Karl Bock, the English naturalist, inscribed his volume to "Chulalongkorn, who rules with wisdom, justice and progress for his watchwords." It has been suggested that the Crown Prince will go a step further than his father, and abolish polygamy in Siam.

The programme planned for the Prince's reception provided that he should be met at New York by Herbert D. Peirce, Third Assistant Secretary of State, and D. B. Sickles, formerly Consul-General at Bangkok, representing President Roosevelt, and other prominent men. In Washington, full arrangements were made for his highness' entertainment by Secretary Hay and the Siamese Minister, the President extending due courtesies. On the New York programme was a dinner by the Mayor, and by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

The Prince, who was educated in England, is well esteemed by men of learning there and here; and Prof. H. Gore, of Columbia University, and President Eliot, of Harvard, each tendered special hospitalities to the Oriental "stranger within our gates." Hon. William Potter (formerly Minister to Italy), a personal friend of King Chulalongkorn, was announced as the Prince's host in Philadelphia. His stay in New York, terminating October 29, will be succeeded by a Western tour.

LIGHT ON JEWISH LIFE*

A Valuable Work on the Jewish People, Their Beliefs, Customs and History

THE high standard established in the first volume of the Jewish Encyclopedia, already noticed in these columns, is fully maintained in the second volume, now issued. As in the earlier volume, the editors have included not only theological and historical matter, but have dealt with all topics related to the Jewish people in their social and religious life, as well as furnishing biographical details in reference to Jews who have attained eminence in our own and other lands in ancient and modern times. Christian readers find here a mine of information which sheds light on passages in both the Old and New Testaments. The articles on the Ark of the Covenant, on Baptism, and on "Bare-headedness," with special reference to Paul's directions about praying with the head uncovered, are specimens of many others, which will be read by Christians with interest and profit. As an evidence of the thoroughness with which the various topics are treated, it will be noted that although the two volumes thus far issued contain an aggregate of 1,370 large double column pages, the work has reached only the word, "Benash" in its alphabetical arrangement. The amount of learning, of research and of literary skill in condensation and in the concise presentation of facts displayed in this monumental enterprise, reflect great credit on both contributors and editors. Throughout this and the first volume there is conspicuous a spirit of fairness in dealing with Christian topics, which, considering the treatment the Jews have too often received at Christian hands, shows rare magnanimity.

Many quaint legends of Rabbinical lore are contained in this volume, which, though not having the weight or authority of statements in the Bible, are not necessarily altogether myths. One of these, that has a romantic interest, is the legend that Asenath, Joseph's wife, was the daughter of that Potiphar whom he served as a slave. In Genesis 41:45 she is said to be the daughter of Potiphar, priest of On, while the Potiphar who was Joseph's master is said (Genesis 39:1) to have been the captain of Pharaoh's guard. The Midrashic story describes her personal appearance, and gives a full account of her renunciation of idols and of Joseph's wooing and of the marriage.

Another legend, which has special interest for many inquirers, who have asked what became of the Ark of the Covenant, is to the effect that when the siege of Jerusalem began, Jeremiah, by divine direction, took the Ark, and the most sacred of the vessels used in the Temple, and buried them in a cave on Mt. Sinai, informing those who wished to know the place, that it would remain unknown until the time when God would restore his people to his favor and would gather them together again in their own land.

A particularly valuable article is that on the word, Atonement, which shows how the original meaning of the word changed and a totally different meaning was attached to it. The article on Baptism, too, is specially interesting, showing, as it does, the part the rite had in the Jewish system, before John the Baptist made it prominent in his movement. The word, Aramaic, is the title of an article of great value. It explains how the Aramaic language displaced the Hebrew, and became in our Lord's time the ordinary language of the people, to be displaced in its turn by Arabic and Greek. The article on Assyria gives the latest discoveries, and shows how they confirm the history contained in the Bible. It is impossible here to give even bare mention of the articles that are of interest to the non-Jewish reader. The amount of information they give, and the obscure Biblical allusions that they elucidate, render the work invaluable to every Bible student.

Health, ... Beauty and a Good Figure.

I do not THINK I can give you these priceless gifts—I KNOW.

I have given them to 5,000 women by teaching them the simple laws of Nature. Give me 15 minutes of your time each day for six weeks and I will give you not only freedom from suffering, but make your life a joy, your work a pleasure and your pleasure perfect. I will give you individually exactly what you need to build up, fill out or reduce your figure to graceful symmetrical proportions and secure for you a fine carriage. I will give you poise—mental, moral, vital—perfect self-possession, clear brain, quick perception, winning manner. These are the gifts of perfect health and perfect knowledge of yourself.

Fifteen minutes a day is no tax on any person's time or patience and for it you may have bounding life in your veins, fine color, bright eyes—happiness. I know woman's needs and troubles through 12 years' experience in helping them. I have yet to find one whom I cannot benefit. I undertook my work by mail because I succeeded so well in personal work, and the benefits which my pupils have received have been more and greater than I ever dared to hope.

Remember, my work is physical culture—not mere muscular exercise. You want something which reaches causes; you want something for your own special need. I have made so many women thankful and happy, I shall be glad to help you also. Men cannot do this work for women. They do not understand our conditions nor limitations.

Write to me whatever you need or think upon the matter and I shall be pleased to send you free full information regarding my system and testimonial letters from pupils, and for ten cents enclosed an instructive and interesting booklet, with a card for your dressing table showing the correct lines of the woman's figure in poise and movement.

Yours for a body expressing perfect health, perfect grace and perfect womanhood.

A RARE CHANCE FOR AGENTS WRITE AT ONCE CONCERNING AMMON; now he had a word that he must speak to this people. The Chaldeans who had conquered Israel should conquer Ammon also. The thrilling description of desolation in Ezek. 25: 4, 5 equals that which had been predicted of Judah, over whose fall the children of Ammon (who were descended from Lot) had rejoiced. They had cherished a spirit of enmity against Israel from very early days. It is expressly said of Ammon: "Thou shalt be no more remembered, for I the Lord have spoken it" (Ezek. 21: 32); and yet: "Thou shalt know that I am the Lord." And in Jer. 49: 6, after a similar declaration of the destruction of Ammon, which was to be one of the nations that should drink the wine of God's fury at his hand (Jer. 25: 15, 21), we find to our astonishment: "Afterward I will bring again the captivity of the children of Ammon, saith the Lord."

The True Judgment Seat

Human Censorious Sentences A Usurpation of God's Prerogative

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

JUDGE not, that ye be not judged" is one of those laws of the Gospel of the kingdom which was refused by the Jews when they crucified their King, but which is yet to be established in the millennial earth. And our Lord makes to it the following addition: "For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you" (Matt. 7: 1, 2). This principle is wonderfully illustrated in Ezekiel 25: 33. Israel had, indeed, sinned deeply against her God, but he had never deputed her heathen enemies to be her judges. They might be instruments in his hand to execute his judgments upon her, but instruments only; in no way able to arrogate to themselves any superiority to God's fallen and disgraced people.

Ezekiel's mouth was shut to his own people from the time, in which God had made known to him that the siege of Jerusalem had begun, until such time as he that should escape from the doomed city should bring to him the tidings that the city was taken. But although the prophet had no word for his own people, he had a message for the heathen who took advantage of Israel's fall to indulge in evil speaking against her. It was Israel's sin that she had become a reproach among the heathen, as it was David's sin when his great fall caused the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme (II Sam. 12: 14); but the enemies of the Lord on their part have to learn that God has not abdicated the seat of judgment in favor of those who themselves have sinned; and he teaches them that the usurpation of judgment upon fellow-sinners is so grave a sin in his sight that they who practice it are creating the measure of their own judgment. There is a deep meaning, a holy exactitude and equity, in the prayer which we are taught to utter: "Forgive us our trespasses [or debts] as we forgive," which means just in the same measure. The tendency to condemn others is so common with us all, joined as it is with that suspiciousness which thinketh evil—love "thinketh no evil"—that we need, indeed, to learn how fully the mind of God is against this prevalent sin.

Already a word had been given to Ezekiel concerning Ammon; now he had a word that he must speak to this people. The Chaldeans who had conquered Israel should conquer Ammon also. The thrilling description of desolation in Ezek. 25: 4, 5 equals that which had been predicted of Judah, over whose fall the children of Ammon (who were descended from Lot) had rejoiced. They had cherished a spirit of enmity against Israel from very early days. It is expressly said of Ammon: "Thou shalt be no more remembered, for I the Lord have spoken it" (Ezek. 21: 32); and yet: "Thou shalt know that I am the Lord." And in Jer. 49: 6, after a similar declaration of the destruction of Ammon, which was to be one of the nations that should drink the wine of God's fury at his hand (Jer. 25: 15, 21), we find to our astonishment: "Afterward I will bring again the captivity of the children of Ammon, saith the Lord."

There is never any real discrepancy in the inspired Word which God has caused to be written for our learning. We may lack light, but patient waiting upon God for light, results in our seeing more and more the wonderful harmony of the Word. It is remarkable that in almost all the prophecies relating to Ammon, it is not the country but the people, "the children of Ammon," who are mentioned. Truly the Ammonites as a people, and Ammon as a country, have ceased to exist, but surely every child of Ammon who did learn to know the Lord will not be an exception from other believers; their captivity will be turned again. But there may be some future for Ammon of which we are as yet ignorant: perhaps in the millennial earth (see Isa. 11: 14). It is a striking fact that in that mysterious, and, we think, as yet unfulfilled, eleventh chapter of Daniel, "Edom, Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon" are mentioned as those which shall be delivered out of the hand of that king which shall speak against the God of gods.

Ezekiel's next word is against Moab and Mount Seir. Jeremiah had spoken of the sins of Moab at this time: love of ease, idolatry, pride, and magnifying himself against the Lord (Jer. 48: 11, 13, 29, 26, 42). Ezekiel finds in Moab the same sin, evil speaking, as in Ammon. What they said was in man's view perfectly true: Israel was like the nations; she had chosen to be so; but Israel was the chosen of God, and thus could never be just as the nations not so chosen: the reflection thus made on her was aimed at the God of Israel. Moab insulted him in saying Judah was like the nations. Evil speaking may be true or false; but, unless God has commissioned us, as Nathan was commissioned to say to David, "Thou art the man" (II Sam. 12: 7), or as Peter was commissioned to charge Ananias and Sapphira with their lie to the Holy Ghost (Acts 5: 4-9), we step out of our place when we speak evil of one of another, and we judge God's law.

Labor-Saving Machines in the Lead

The greatest number of inventions have been among the labor-saving machines. Eli Whitney with his cotton-gin, saved time and toil in picking out the seeds from cotton, and this led to spinning and weaving machines, and finally Howe's sewing machine and the electric looms. The immense farming districts compelled men to seek to cover distances in a short time, therefore the invention of horse-ploughs, mowers, reapers, binders, etc., which are now run by steam and electricity. The extensive tracts of dense forests led to the invention of sewing, planing, and turning machines. Our forefathers jogged along week after week on foot, horseback, or in rough wagons, carrying their baggage with them on journeys which, thanks to Watts' discovery of steam and Fulton's steamboat, enable us to complete in a tenth of the time. The Baltimore and Ohio Railway, in 1830, began the many miles of railway which has since been improved with large, airy passenger trains, sleeping and dining-cars. Lack of space in the crowded cities promoted the idea of the elevated and underground tracks. Franklin's electrical experiments were the parent of all subsequent inventions connected with electricity. To him the world owes the knowledge which led to substituting electricity for the poor horse in our trolley-cars and automobiles. With its use Morse invented the telegraph, Field the cable, Bell the telephone, so that now every important item of news is known from one end of the country to the other in a few hours.

Miscellaneous Questions

Anne M., Tarrytown. What is the origin of the expression, "You may as well hunt for it as for a needle in a bottle of hay?" We have had considerable discussion at home about this, and have decided to refer the matter to you.

We used, in our younger days, to speculate as to how the hay got in the bottle, and what a needle was doing there, anyway. But we have found out now that there never was any bottle, nor any needle either, worthy of the name. The expression comes to us from England. In the Derbyshire district, a bundle of hay which was taken from the rick to fodder cattle in the field, was called a "bottle of hay." It was often tied round with a cord of twisted hay, fastened by a wooden spike called a needle. When the "bottle" was opened, the needle was sometimes lost, and had to be found, with great trouble, for fear of injury to the cattle.

C. I. H., Shenandoah, Pa. 1. When was the first strike in America and what were its results? 2. When was the first trades-union organized here? 3. Has any country a compulsory Arbitration Law, and how does it operate?

1. The journeyman bakers' strike in New York, 1741, is the first recorded. The leaders were tried for conspiracy. The sailors struck in 1803, for $14 against $10 a week. The leaders were put in jail. 2. The General Trades Union was organized in New York in 1833. National and international trades-unions took form between 1850-60. Labor unions were in existence long before this. The New York Society of Journeymen Shipwrights was organized in 1803. The first Coal-Miners' Union seems to have been formed in 1885. 3. New Zealand. John W. H., Stony Fork, Pa. We read that Adam was God's son, made in his Image. What is your opinion of the Image of God?

The image of God, in which Adam was created, did not consist in form or features, nor even in intellect, nor in his immortality, but in his moral nature, and in the character of his entire being. If the edict of the Creator, "Let us make man in our own image," was addressed to those spiritual beings that serve Him, then it may well be inferred that man in his original state was a bright and beautiful spiritual being, in character, disposition and appearance, resembling the angels.

H. G., Macon, Ga. How did the expression, "halcyon days," originate?

It has its origin in a pagan legend. When the gods informed Alcyon that her husband, Cyex, was drowned, she cast herself into the sea; and the gods, to reward the well-known devotion of the pair to each other, changed them into halcyons, or kingfishers. According to the poets, the sea was always calm while these birds built their nests; and according to ancient naturalists, they built their nests during the seven days immediately preceding the winter solstice, and laid their eggs in the seven immediately following. Hence, these were called "halcyon days." The term applies now to times of peace and happiness.

P. L., Chicago. How extensive is the vocabulary used by the average person?

The majority of people do not use, from day to day, more than a thousand words. Three hundred words probably constitute the entire resources of the illiterate. Well educated people are familiar with from two thousand to three thousand, the cultured with about five thousand words. Shakespeare in all his productions makes use of only fifteen thousand words, although there are three hundred thousand in the English language.

A Woman's Journey Through China

Arranging the Missionary Indemnities

IT was to arrange the indemnity claims of our missionary organization that we made a journey to Shansi, a midwinter trip through the unknown interior to the borders of Mongolia. In Peking, it was our privilege to stay at the palace of the Duchess Teh, the temporary home of the American Board. I send her portrait, with the delightful explanation that this proud pearl of a noble house has embraced Christianity, as also her princely husband, own nephew to the Empress Dowager.

Our wuyuen, or guide, Ch'ien Pao Chen—a fatherly old man, robed with silk and fur, was awaiting our pleasure at Pao-tung, the starting point of the journey, under government escort; it was a new chapter in our life of routine work in China. "Would we condescend to ride in those beautiful official chairs? And would we command him, our humble servant (an honored Prefect), to grant us every service in his power?" To those who have lived on the flat plains around Tientsin and Shanghai, it is impossible to describe the delights of the mountain regions of Shansi. Our equipage was about ten days winding over the mountains between Pao-tung, the capital of Chili, and Taiyuen, the capital of Shansi, 900 Chinese miles. We were told that Mr. Nichols, the correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, had preceded us over this road on his famine fund journey.

It was the route over which the French and German troops passed, after the punitive expedition to the Chili capital; and through natural gateways which the Shansi mountaineers thought impregnable. It was a masterpiece of modern military skill, to scale those peaks, and file through the famous Passes, known as the Four Heavenly Gates—east, west, north and south. Marks of their progress was visible, notably, at the north Heavenly Gate, where the temples presented a curious sight. The idols had been attacked, evidently, in the place of something better, and were still languishing where they had fallen. Down this same high road, the friends of China, the foreign missionaries, had fled for their lives, seeking refuge in wayside caves and valleys. The whole region was alive with memories of 1900.

Our chief stopping places en route were Huailo, Pingtingcheo, Sheoyang. At all of these and many more we were feasted, and passed on from city to city, with every mark of honor—banners waving, couriers welcoming, officials meeting, with soldiers marching and firing salutes as we entered or "farewelled." Our rooms in the inns were always gaily decorated in crimson, warmed with braziers of glowing charcoal, and the seats of honor around the central stand extended to us with greetings from the assembled mandarins.

When the audience was concluded, cups of fragrant tea were sipped in token, and we separated with lavish demonstrations of mutual esteem, and the presentation of Bibles. These were always accepted with pleasure.

As we began the mountain ascent at Huailohsien, we rested on the Sabbath day, and the mandarin assembled the worshipers by courier at the little chapel. One doors, one after the other, creaked on their hinges, until we stood in a dismal inner court. The prisoners could not possibly have escaped, yet they were loaded with chains, and confined in such narrow quarters, with nothing to do from one weary week to another. We plead with the mandarin to present them Gospels, and were granted our desire.

We reached the mining centre, Pingtingcheo, on Christmas morning, and were welcomed with a procession of "Horribles" and a band of Chinese musicians. Shots in our honor echoed through the hills, and six mandarins surrounded us in the crimson room of the inn. The courier had failed to bring the news of our arrival in time for the preparations to be perfected; and, to our astonishment, he was brought in, and, prostrate on the floor, began begging for mercy. He was sternly sentenced by the Cheo Prefect, and we had the joy of begging His Highness' clemency.

The great city of Taiyuenfu was soon to greet our eyes. On a plain, at the foot of mountain ranges, surrounded by barracks and within a wall, surmounted by numerous towers, it attracted our gaze far down the highway. The dust was suffocating, as numbers of caravans, camel and donkey, went by. Then cavalymen sprang out, and saluting down the roadside, mounted their ponies, and preceded us through the gate into the main street of the city. It was lined with people, and very long. We were so interested in sightseeing in this new world, that almost ere aware, the last corner was turned, and we were ushered into the crowded court, in the midst of which stood H. E. Shen Tun Ho. He advanced with a smile, greeted us in fluent English, and shook hands American fashion.

His appearance was handsome in the extreme. He wore gold-rimmed foreign spectacles, and appeared much at home in our society, speaking easily on any topic broached. Mr. Sowerby and two missionary brethren were also guests of Shen Tun Ho, until their own home was ready. Extensive ruins mark their old mission compounds. Only one or two mission stations had been reoccupied. It was a lonely province, and the balance of our journey would be among strangers in a strange land. The fate of our mission in the far north had remained somewhat of a mystery—none having yet penetrated into the remote districts so recently man was converted, and all listened as only those can who have been so long waiting the return of their missionary teachers. It was the light of heaven that beamed in their faces, as they welcomed us, and we were inspired to do our utmost. The mandarin received us in his yamen, afterwards conducting me to the apartments of his mother; and after an elaborate tea, we were escorted, with a lantern brigade, to the dismal prison house, where robbers, murderers and brigands were serving out their sentence. Divine Mother-Love

TEXT, Isa. 66:13:

"As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you"

WASHINGTON IRVING has aptly been called the Father of American Literature. But among all the writings of the Wizard of Sunnyside, there is not a chapter more trenchantly powerful than that on "The Art of Book-making." In it the author pictures himself asleep and dreaming, in the library of the British Museum. His head is pillowed upon a pile of musty tomes. While he dreams, he sees the different authors of the present day poring over the manuscripts of the ancient libraries, and making ample notes and verbatim copies of the same, and, indeed, going so far as to cut entire leaves from the books of a Beaumont, a Fletcher, a Pollock, and a Ben Jonson. Then the dreamer sees these modern authors pasting together the verbatim excerpts and the stolen leaves into new volumes and printing their own names upon the title pages. These literary piracies continue, until at last the cry of "Thieves! thieves!" is raised. Then there is a great hubbub and scurrying among the modern authors, because the ancient writers, whose faces and bodies are pictured within the quaint, old-fashioned frames hanging upon the wall of the British Museum, are changed into flesh and blood, ready to snatch the new books out of the hands of the kidnappers, and to claim them as the offsprings of their own brain, some of them born centuries upon centuries ago.

The obvious moral of the imaginative tale is, that there is nothing new under the sun. No man, woman or child, no matter how intelligent, can ever lay claim to true originality. We are all, physically and mentally, as well as spiritually, reproductions of other lives. We are all combinations of other people's thoughts and desires and actions, even as the walls of an ancient palace are often huge mosaics of many different stones cut from many different quarries. While many have contributed to make us what we are, the largest contribution is the maternal one. How much of all that is good and pure in our nature do we owe to our mothers! How much of all the peace and comfort we have enjoyed do we owe to their wise and loving ministry! It is this fact which we all recognize, that the prophet uses to impress on us the love and kindness of God. No simile could be more effective as that in my text: "As one whom his mother comforteth."

A Mother's Devotion

The words of my text have for many of us a very tender and reverent application. The greatest lessons of a sacrificing and a forgiving love have been learned by most of us from the now silent lips of our Christian mothers. Though your mother may have been dead for ten or twenty years, yet you remember as though it were yesterday, how tenderly she cared for you when you were a little child. You remember how she nursed you through that long fit of sickness, when you were about fifteen, and every time she left the room, you would call, "Mother, mother! Where is mother?" You well remember how she placed her hand upon your shoulder and looked long and earnestly into your eyes, the day you left for the great city or college, as though she were trying to make up her mind whether she could trust you away from home. You also remember how, when a man grown, you had that great trouble in life, and your chief desire was to get back to the old homestead and tell mother. And, alas! you well remember the dark day when you carried her out to gently let her body down into the open grave. When you laid her away to sleep among the spring flowers, or when you covered her up under the soft quilt of spotless snow, the purest, gentlest, noblest, most forgiving and helpful of human companions was forever taken from your side. Remembering all this love and devotion, we realize the force of the metaphor which Isaiah, the prophet, uses when, seeking to show how tenderly God loves and cares for his children, he takes the gentle, maternal influence which has done so much to develop our physical and mental and spiritual life, and says: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

The Divine Being shows the love of a mother in wanting to be the comforter of all the young folks who are preparing for the great struggle of life. The mother wants to be the inspiring friend of her boys and girls, during the long years of immaturity, when the world at large is sneering at them and laughing at their ambitions, as though they were the mere outgrowths of a foolish and a visionary brain. She wants to be the friend of the young men and the young women during those school-days, when they have no earning capacity, and when they are entirely dependent upon others for financial support. The struggle of life, even under the best conditions, is a hard one, but that struggle does not commence, as some people suppose, when the young man stands with a diploma in hand on the graduating day from school or college. It commences away back in the "early teens." It commences with the young girl's failure who is trying for the prize in the school-room. It commences with the disappointments of the playground. It commences with those little youthful sorrows and trials which the boy and the girl can tell to no one but mother. Yes, the mother's comfort which is given to the young folks is an all-important comfort. It is such a necessary comfort that many of us, when we were young, often could not go to sleep because of our weeping, until we heard her foot moving across our bedroom floor, and felt her gentle hand upon our cheek, and heard her soft voice saying, "Never mind, my boy! It will come out all right. I will speak to your papa about the matter, and I know he will let us do what you want." God pity the man who never had the gentle influence of a comforting mother during the days of childhood or of young manhood! God pity the boy who never knew the holy joy of having his tears wiped away by a mother's hand, after he had been hurt upon the ball ground!

Seeks the Children

God, as the Divine Mother, to-day wants to be the companion and the comforting friend and Saviour of all the boys and the girls and the young folks. As Christ once turned and rebuked his disciples, who tried to crowd away the young people from his side, and said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not for of such is the kingdom of heaven," so to-day he bids the children come to him, and clamber up into his lap, and nestle as little lambs against the warm, loving heart of the Good Shepherd. Christ to-day longs to be the Divine Friend of the boy swinging the bat, and of the girl dressing the doll, as well as the Divine Friend of young men and women in the school and college. Do you realize, O mother, that God loves your children with a love more intense than that which fills your heart? If you have not made your children understand this, if you have never sought to impart to them the sweet fellowship and holy joy which can bind their hearts to him, you have been derelict in your duty, you have not really consecrated them to Christ's service. Teach them how tenderly God loves them, and they will learn to love, honor and trust him as they love, honor and trust you.

That even a little child can learn this lesson was proved by the conversation which a little girl had some time ago with her small brother. She was playing Sunday School. Of course, being the elder, she was the Sunday School teacher. As the teacher, she was heard to say, "Now, Johnny, I will tell you how you ought to trust Jesus. You should trust him just as you do Mamma. When you go out walking, Johnny, what do you do? Why you put your hand in Mamma's hand and just hold on. Sometimes you will stumble, Johnny, but then Mamma's hand will hold you up. So you just put your little hand in Jesus' hand. You are a little boy, but Jesus loves little boys. You may stumble, Johnny, but hold on to Jesus' hand, and then Jesus, like Mamma, will never let you fall." As the little Sunday School teacher said, may all the boys and the girls learn to trust Christ's love as they have learned to trust their mother's love. Just put your small hands into Christ's hands, and never let go. Then the Divine love will help you little folks, and you young men and young women, to bear your smaller trials, even as your earthly mother will comfort you when you are in trouble. And remember this, young people—in the small trials of life, you need Christ's help just as much as the older people need it to bear their bigger trials. The ant carrying a small crumb, is performing a task as herculean as the team of oxen who are dragging a heavy laden sledge.

Welcomes the Wanderer

The Divine Being is like a mother, too, in wanting to be the forgiving comforter of all who have gone astray. When a man does wrong, and persists in doing wrong, nearly all the world will turn against him. First, as a rule, the sinner's retribution is found in his employer's anger, when he is dismissed from the store. When a man has sinned once or even twice, his employer may forgive him. But when he appears at the store intoxicated the third or fourth time, then comes the peremptory order that he must go at once to the cashier's office and receive what is owing him, and forever leave the establishment. Then his friends are apt to turn against him. Then his brothers and sisters and children and father, and even his wife, do the same. But though nearly all the human race will turn against a sinner, as a rule, there is one human being, if she is alive, who will never cease to reach after the prodigal. That person, as you all know before I speak her name, is the sinner's mother. The young man may sin not only seven times, but seventy times seven; he may be so worthless in the eyes of the world that all his friends may come to that mother and say her son is not worth being saved; he may be so useless that even the father may order the son out of the home, and disown and disinherit him; but the mother will cling, and continue to cling, to her boy. If she thought that thereby she could give her son one more chance for repentance, she would sell the clothes out of her wardrobe, necessary; she would move out of her fine home and go to work; she would sell her jewelry and even her wedding ring. She would go to the extent of giving up her life, if she could only save her boy.

A Mother's Compassion

In imagination we can picture a scene, the like of which is nightly happening in thousands of homes. It is about two or three o'clock in the morning. All the rooms are darkened in the home, except one. There the light is steadily burning in the bedroom. Ever little while a woman, prematurely gray and feeble on account of mental suffering, comes to the window, and raises the curtain and places an anxious face against the pane. Then she goes back to a chair and wrings her hands. Then she kneels by her sofa and offers an earnest prayer. She cries, and begins to put on her hat and cloak. The man who is sleeping in the bed is roused by the opening of the closet door, and he says, "Mother, why don't you come to bed? It is useless for you to fret and cry away your life over that worthless boy." "Oh, husband," she answers, "I cannot give him up. He was so handsome and good to me before the evil companions got hold of him. It is not my baby boy, Harry, that is so bad to his mother. It is sin, awful sin. And if, by the help of God, I can get sin out of his heart, he will be the same loving child that he used to be. I am going out into this storm to try to hunt him up."

Just then there is a quick ring at the bell. The mother rushes down stairs and throws open the door. With that, two young men drag the intoxicated son into the hall and disappear like evil spirits into the darkness. There is a deep gash over the young man's forehead. His face is covered with blood. The terror-stricken woman throws herself down by the parlor and begins to wipe away the blood as she cries, "Oh, my boy! my boy! My sinful, sinful boy!" When the young man begins to regain consciousness from his drunken stupor, he turns and sees her tearful face bending over him. Then, realizing the awfulness of his sin and how he is breaking her heart, he says, "Mother, why do you love me? Why do you not turn your back upon me as every one else is doing?" "Because, my son," she answers, "I know that it is no yourself who is breaking my heart and killing me. I am sin! And I also know that if I can only bring you to know my Saviour, he will give you strength to overcome your sin, and you will be the same loving boy you used to be. No, Harry, I will never leave you or turn my back upon you, no matter how you make me suffer until I can bring you to Christ." Like a Divine mother, God never turns his back upon his erring children who have gone astray. The further we have wandered, the more goes after us. He is ready to do even more for our salvation and eternal rescue than our own earthly mothers are willing to do. In the Psalmist's own words we read, "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up," or, as the revised version more beautifully expresses it: "Then the Lord will gather me up." Ye wayward, sinful children, can ye not look upon the face of your God and see there a face illumined with the tender, forgiving, and pardoning love of a comforting mother.

Like a Divine mother, God wants to be the comforter of all those who have made temporal failure of life—of those whose early ambitions have been as completely shattered and wrecked as were the ships in Apia Harbor when the Samoan tornado drove them upon the rocks. He wants to be the comforter of those who have had to face a bankruptcy court, or who have had the dearest desires of their hearts annihilated. He wants to be the comforter of practically the whole human race, for temporal troubles that sooner or later come to about everybody.

Now, it is a great and inspiring realization to know that after we have done our level best in life, when temporal troubles come, we can all go back to the old homestead and find there a warm welcome, if only our mothers are alive. It is a great comfort to know that, if sickness comes, and we can no longer earn our daily bread, our mothers, if they are alive, will gladly share with us and give to us at least a half and more than a half of what they have. If consumption begins to grow the red roses in the flower gardens of your pale cheek, you know that if your mother is alive she will come and take you home. She will come and gather you up, you and all your little ones, and will take you in her arms back to the room in which you passed your boyhood, and will let your babies play and romp in the old nursery where you once played. God, like a Divine mother, is ready to share all that he has with his children who have made a financial failure or a temporal failure out of life.

A Maori's Faith

Thus all the troubled and the sorely disappointed of earth should take great comfort out of the thought that God's love for them is like that of a divine mother. They should be able to look at all worldly things, whether good or ill, as did the Maori chief, who, though born in a New Zealand mud-hut, could turn to the Duke of Devonshire when he was being shown one of the most beautiful palaces of the world, and say, "This palace is not as beautiful as the mansion which my heavenly Father has builded for me." Though the troubled Christians may be clothed in rags, yet they should feel that they are rich, because God, as a heavenly mother, has prepared for them the wedding garments with which they shall be robed in the heavenly banquet halls at the King's marriage. Though they may be poor, yet they should feel, like the invalid son going home to his earthly parent, confident that a welcome awaits them, and sure that all the treasures of heaven shall be forever theirs.

God, like a divine mother, wants to be the comforter of his children in their last earthly sicknesses, as well as when he is bending over them in their cradles. He wants to be the comforter of the dying invalid, when he utters the agonizing moan, "I cannot stand this pain any longer," as well as the comforter of the little child who is sitting for the first time in her Sunday class. He wants to be the comforter of all those who have been disappointed in life, and who when they come to die, may be gladdened by seeing him, feeling like the old statesman, Henry Clay, who in his last moments looked up with a sweet smile and cried, "Mother! mother!" Ah, in that hour we shall need a mother's love, as much as does the schoolboy who romps into the hallway, calling to the cook, "Mary, where is mother?" And this simile is true because of all times when a mother chiefly longs to be by the side of her child, it is when that child is dying.

A Royal Nurse

When the eldest son of Queen Alexandra was sick unto death, the then Princess of Wales had hundreds of trained and most skillful nurses who would gladly have answered to her call. But day and night, for three long weeks, the mother of the Duke of Clarence never left his side. It was her royal hand that smoothed the sheets. It was her arm that lifted the fevered head. It was her lips that gave the last kiss, as the immortal spirit sped from the pain-racked form. Yes, the mother, the true earthly mother, wants to be the last comforter by the side of her dying child. It was in order to satisfy this maternal desire that Princess Alice, the daughter of Queen Victoria, disobeyed the orders of the physicians, and bending over the bed that was reeking with the diphtheritic germs, kissed her baby girl farewell, and at the same time pressed her own lips against the hot lips of death. Princess Alice laid down her life on account of that maternal kiss. So God, as a divine mother, is always by the death-beds of his children.

God, like a Divine Mother, specially loves to hover around the death-bed of his children, because he can there prove to us that "it is not all of death to die, nor all of life to live," and that death can be swallowed up in victory. He can prove it to those who have accepted his love and his sacrifice for their sins, as John Simeon proved it to his children when he himself was dying. In imagination, the departing saint raised himself, and looking back, cried out,—"Who are you?" "Sorrow!" "Who are you?" "Sighing!" Then stretching his hands upward, the dying saint cried out again, "And who are you?" "Joy." "And who are you?" "Gladness!" Then, with a seraphic smile, the dying Christian again cried out,

"Farewell, Sorrow! Farewell, Sighing!"

Farewell, Mortal Life. Welcome, Joy. Welcome, Gladness. Welcome, Eternal Heaven." If an earthly mother would long to be the earthly comforter of her dying boy, surely Jesus longs to be beside his believing and trusting children at their departure, to tell them of the hope and the joy, and the transcendent triumph which await their heavenly translation.

But I may be talking about a love which some of you have never known, and there may be some young men here who never knew what it was to possess a mother's love. I remember a short time after my own mother's funeral, I stood for a long while with tear-stained cheeks studying a picture called, "The Mother's Vacant Chair." The scene was a workingman's home. The great broad-chested mechanic sat at the head of the supper-table, dejectedly holding a little baby in his arms, who was laughingly reaching out for his bowl of milk. Four or five other little children were gathered about, laughing and playing, and also reaching for the food upon the table. Not one of those little ones realized in any way the awful loss to them of the form that had once filled that mother's vacant chair, save, perhaps, the eldest girl, about thirteen years of age. As I stood before that picture, with a sob choking my throat, I said, "God help me to bear my trouble. But my bereavement of a dear, noble, Christian mother is as nothing compared to the loss to those children, who, when they grow up, will never know the joy of experiencing a mother's love."

Tender Reminiscences

Yes, perhaps, you are one of those unfortunates who never knew a mother's love. Though her affections were so intense that your coming was her meat and drink, her hope by day and her prayer by night, yet hardly had you come into the world when she passed away. She really gave up her life for you. Once in a while, with a longing to find out something about the height and depth of a mother's love, you may go to some gray-haired old lady and say: "Tell me something about my mother. You knew her well, and were her bridesmaid when she was married." Then that gray-haired lady will go over all the past. She will tell you what a gentle, loving face your mother had. She will tell you how her eyes lighted up when you were first placed in her arms, and she looked at you and said: "My baby, my baby, my little baby! God bless my baby." Then that gray-haired lady will tell you how your mother's strength never came back again after you were born. They took her South, hoping that the sunny skies would make her strong again; but only the warm sunshine of that Eternal City to which she went ever worked her cure. As the old lady talks, you look at your mother's picture again and again, and try to imagine her love for you. But, young man, you cannot do that any more than a blind bat or a ground mole can fully appreciate the colors of a butterfly's wing, or the reflection of a dewdrop. So in order to symbolize God's love to you, a sinful man, who never knew what it was to have a mother's love, I would tell you that it is a greater love than the combined loves of a father, a wife, children, brothers, and sisters, and friends. It is a love so deep that no line can fathom it; so high that no bird's wing can overfly it; so wide that no mathematician can circumscribe it. And all this love of our earthly mother is only an infinitesimal part of the love which to-day God, like a Divine Mother, is ready to pour out of his forgiving heart for you. Can you not grasp even a little of the infinite sweep of my text, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

But perhaps I can better illustrate what your dear mother's love was to you, by telling you of an incident which happened in the life of a very dear friend of mine. When I started out in the ministry, I was the assistant of the Rev. Loyal Young Graham, D.D., of Philadelphia. When Dr. Graham, as a young man, was being ordained for the Christian ministry. Rev. Dr. Loyal Young, one of the most eminent ministers of western Pennsylvania in his day, was preaching the ordination sermon. There, he told this story for the first time:

Consecration by a Dying Mother

"Many years ago," said he, "a beautiful young woman of the congregation I was at the time serving, lay dying. When I made my last call upon her, she bade everyone else leave the room. Then she lifted her little baby boy up, and placed him in my arms, as she said: 'Doctor Young, I am going to die. I want you to kneel and offer a consecration prayer. I want you to consecrate this boy to the ministry of the Lord Jesus and to the service of my Master. I am giving up my life for my baby. Now, sir, I want to give my baby to the service of my Christ. This is a dying mother's wish. I do not want you ever to tell of this consecration until the day my little baby has grown into a strong man, and is being ordained to the Christian ministry.' 'I am here to-night,' said Doctor Young, 'to fulfil my pledge. That baby who was consecrated to the Divine Master's service, is the young man we are ordaining to-night, Loyal Young Graham is that boy. May his mother in heaven, who gave her life for her child, be witness of this holy scene.'"

Sinful man sitting before me to-day, are you the son of a Christian mother? Whether she is alive now or dead, her love for you was, or is, just as great as Loyal Young Graham's mother was for him. Are you to-day letting her prayers find a fulfillment in your life? Are you to-day letting the love of God manifested in the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ find a response in your life? Will you, here and now, realizing that your mother's love was a symbol of God's love for you, surrender your life to the service of Him who, like a Divine mother, yearns over you? Remember this, Oh, sinful man—God longs for your repentance more than you can ever long to be cleansed through the blood of Christ, and to be forgiven for your past sins. It is to the mother-love in God that I point you. It is to One who will cling to you, long after even an earthly mother's affections shall have ceased, and when they have forever faded away.

QUAINT PSALMS FOR QUEER FOLK

...By...
Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM V. Defense Psalm

11. But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee.

12. For thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; with favor wilt thou compass him as with a shield.

David had God for his defense and was not confounded. In meditation, word and prayer, he reveals his constant trust in the Lord for help from inward and outward enemies.

His faith was well founded. His psalms open with prayer, but close with praises. David knew that God hated iniquity, and it is true, that a man's estimate of God not only reveals his character but shapes his destiny.

"Compass him as with a shield"

PSALM VI. A Psalm of Tears

6. I am weary with my groaning; all the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tears.

Folk who never weep are intruders here. It is holy ground, made so by sorrow.

"The Tears of Christ."

"Jesus wept." No wonder that verse stands alone in the Bible.

A penitent's tear is priceless in heaven. The need of this hour is first for the church to weep over her sins and neglect, and then will come that "weeping for souls" that ever brings the shout of joy in a true and genuine revival. No tears in heaven. Thank God!

PSALM VII. Mischief Maker's Psalm

15. He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made.

16. His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate.

There are many strange workers of iniquity, but the mischief maker is, perhaps, worst of all.

"His mischief shall return upon his own head"

He is a spy. Professing friendship, he is a foe.

Let all such read this Psalm and take warning, for it is sure prophecy and his pate will feel the falling blow, not only of his own devisings, but of a just and holy God, who has said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay."

PSALM VIII. The Night Psalm

3. When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; 4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?

The sweep of silence across the sky at night is sublime. Who can take the truth that David records in Ps. VIII. and not feel the presence of God and stand in awe?

This is where one should read in the Bible, long after sunset and alone, with nothing overhead save sky and star and moon. The story of the stars is yet to be told. Man, with all his learning and power, has only written a title page for the book. Chapter I is unfinished. A little while yet, and then, we "shall know."

A SIAMESE SYMBOL

Siam's Crown Prince Visits Us

WHEN Prince Maha Vajiravudh was greeted on the First Bismarck at quarantine in New York harbor, by the official Committee sent to meet him, and by the Siamese Consul and Consul-General, he said that his arrival in this country marked one of the happiest events of his life, and that in visiting the United States he was realizing a long cherished ambition. His frank display of enthusiasm over new experiences has furnished some sharp contrasts to the almost stolid reserve with which the average Oriental takes his first observations of things new and strange. In spite of the haste with which the Committee whisked him out of the hands of the reporters, the Prince made occasion to say that he should be greatly interested in studying our agricultural and manufacturing industries, and that he expected to make the result of his investigations serviceable to his countrymen.

The receiving party consisted of the President's representative, Herbert H. D. Peirce, third Assistant Secretary of State, accompanied by the Siamese Minister, E. H. Loftus, secretary of the Siamese Legation; Lieutenant-Commander Eberle, representing the United States Navy; Col. David B. Sickels, former Minister to Siam; Hon. William Potter, former Minister to Italy, and Edwin Morgan. The Crown Prince responded to Mr. Peirce's words of welcome in excellent English, and expressed himself as eager to learn all he could about this country.

Like Prince Henry of Prussia, he had mastered some American ways on shipboard, and was not averse to displaying them. When his brother, Prince Chakrabongse, indicated to the Crown Prince that it would be more in keeping with his rank to receive his guests sitting, His Royal Highness did not see it in that light. He wore a plain tweed suit, and shook hands with Mr. Peirce just as any American would. He says that his "fifteen years in Europe have made him only more Siamese, if possible," but he shows distinctly the impress of his Occidental training and associations. He has written a book, The War of the Polish Succession, a paper on "The Sacred Elephant of Siam," besides making other contributions to literature. His Royal Highness has many accomplishments. He was known as a hard student at Oxford, where he made a specialty of international law. He was a leader in athletic sports. His record at the Royal Military Academy at Sandhurst, which he attended before going to Oxford, was excellent.

Besides Prince Chakrabongse, Col. Phya Rajavollah, Major Luany Sarasiddhi, Luang Smayndh and Mom Anuvatra, the Prince's secretary, were members of the royal suite. The train reserved to conduct them to Washington, the Columbia, was that Prince Henry used; the Arlington Hotel was his Washington residence. A visit to President Roosevelt and dinners by Secretary Hay and the Siamese Minister, were among the features arranged for his stay in the Capital. A visit to West Point, and other places of historic interest, a dinner by Mayor Low, another by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, made part of the programme planned for his entertainment in New York.

The visit of the future "Lord of the Land of the White Elephants" to our country has naturally awakened much public interest in all that concerns him, and directed unusual attention to the Indo-Chinese and Malayan domain over which he will sometime rule. The quaint customs which in Siam surround this cultured, college-bred Oriental, are all the more curious when considered in connection with him as educationally a product of Oxford, England. Like his father, he is far in advance of his subjects, and doubtless many of their time-honored institutions would go out of existence for lack of royal sanction were the people abreast of their rulers. Even kings, deferring to popular prejudice, must sometimes "make haste slowly." There were some nobles in Siam who were not quite pleased when King Chulalongkorn decreed that they should not crawl any more in his presence!

The Siamese are a genial and gentle race, and very fond of children. The new-born infant is considered "a priceless gift from the beneficent gods," and robed in cloth of gold and loaded with jeweled ornaments, is borne by a gorgeous procession, carrying glittering umbrellas and fans, branches of gold and silver, and peacocks' tails; soldiers, Amazons and troops of white-robed children attend him and a company of Buddhist priests. Amid clang of trumpets, and blowing of sacred conch-shells, the knot of hair on the top of his head, divided into three parts, is severed with scissors of gold, silver and steel. "Holy water" is poured over him until he is quite drenched. After which the king blesses him, saying: "Thou who art come out of the pure waters be thy offences washed away," and commends him to follow the light that led Buddha.

Bangkok has been called the "Venice of the Orient" much of it is built upon the water, and canals often take the place of streets. The new palace is a very handsome structure with modern characteristics and much Occidental furnishing. The triple-walled "City of the Women" is a unique feature of Bangkok. The outer gate is guarded by soldiers; the inner by Amazons; the shops are kept by women. There are some 3,000 inhabitants; there being not a single male adult among the number. Most Siamese nobles desire connection with the royal house; custom permits them to present their daughters to their monarchs, and declining the gift on his part is the extreme of discourtesy; hence, King Chulalongkorn has more ladies bearing his name than he, perhaps, might have chosen by preference; they number some 300. The queen-mother of the Crown Prince, is a woman of culture and strong character. Though women of the royal family lead more secluded lives than the other Siamese women, the etiquette which hedges them in is far less strict than it used to be. Many American ladies have been hospitably entertained by the present queen; one describes a visit, when the Crown Prince (then three years old) in regulation costume—gold anklets, bracelets and shield—climbed on her knee.

The King evidently wishes his successor to be thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Western civilization. The Prince has visited nearly every European Court, and has won golden opinions everywhere by his modest, genial and dignified bearing, and by his earnest study of other lands, in order that he may be a blessing to his own. He returns to Siam to assist in the development of his future realm, which, in embracing Lao and other States, includes people not so advanced as the Siamese, and who will doubtless be greatly benefited by his studies of Western civilization. The encouragement his father has given our missionaries, alone entitled the Prince to a warm reception here.

The last is the great event in the life of a Siamese youth or maiden. To the latter it is her "coming out," or debut as it were; to the former, the dividing line between boyhood and manhood. Even the poor strain their resources to make the top-knot cutting a gala time. In the case of a prince or princess, a magnificent pageant attends the ceremony. A NATIONAL MISSIONARY CONVENTION

THE Missionary Convention, now in session in Cleveland, Ohio, has features of unusual interest. It is the first time in its history that the Methodist Episcopal Church has held a national convention on this subject. The Convention is also representative in an uncommon degree. The foreign missionary cause touches the Church at so many points, that almost every department has a claim to representation. Not only the Missionary Board proper is concerned, but former officers and members who are now bishops; the district missionary secretaries throughout the country; the Epworth League, which has done so much to stimulate contributions; and the Sunday School, which has always been loyal to the cause. Besides these, there are members of the Church in many cities, to whom foreign missions have been, from their youth up, a subject of deep interest. It is not astonishing, therefore, to learn that it has been found necessary to provide accommodation in Cleveland for two thousand visitors to the Convention.

The object of the Convention is disclosed by the titles of the addresses which are to be delivered. First of all the delegates will learn why, at this particular time, there is special need of missionary enthusiasm and unprecedented effort. After Bishop Andrews' opening speech, Dr. J. M. Buckley will give a sketch of what Methodism accomplished in the foreign missionary field during the Nineteenth century, and Dr. A. B. Leonard will describe the present emergency, and tell how it has arisen. The next division in logical order, is an estimate of the forces which the Church has at its command for the stupendous undertaking of evangelizing the world. Dr. A. H. Tuttle will, under his head, speak of "The spiritual preparation for missionary service;" Dr. H. K. Carroll will enumerate "Our Home Allies;" Miss Effie K. Price will speak on "The Place of Prayer in Mission Work," and Dr. J. W. E. Bowen on the service that may be expected from the negro. Then follows a survey of the field, which includes not only heathen lands, but foreign immigrants in our own land. Dr. F. M. North will discuss "The City Problem;" Dr. H. C. Stuntz, our new possessions, Hawaii and the Philippines; Bishop Thoburn, Southern Asia; Bishop McCabe, The Latin Countries; Bishop Moore, Eastern Asia, and Bishop Hartzell, Africa. How the work should be divided so as to enlist the most extensive support is the next stage in the discussion. Dr. W. I. Perrin will show what may be done by the Presiding Elder; Dr. J. O. Wilson, by the Pastor; Mr. W. W. Cooper, by the Sunday School Superintendent; Dr. W. F. Oldham, by the District Missionary Secretary; Mr. S. Earl

G. B. Smyth, Dr. C. E. Locke and Dr. F. D. Gamewell. The closing address will be by Mr. Robert E. Speer, whose missionary zeal has carried him into scenes where one would never have expected to see him, and into company that will give him a more cordial welcome than a man of his denomination would have received in any former generation.

The Convention will be in session from Oct. 22 to 24. The meetings will be held in Gray's Armory, which was the scene of the Methodist Episcopal General Conference of 1896, and of the Student Volunteer Convention of 1898. There is reason to hope that a Convention so widely representative, so thoroughly in earnest as this undoubtedly is, will mark a new accession of energy in foreign missionary work.

Taylor, by the Young People of the Church, and Dr. J. W. Magruder will tell what one local church has done. The whole subject will be gathered up in a series of inspiring addresses on the grace of giving, and the urgent need for it in this missionary crisis. They will be delivered by Mr. J. R. Mott, Dr. W. F. McDowell, Dr.

AN HOUR IN THE CHILDREN'S COURT

THE newly-established Children's Court of New York City is a place of lights, as well as of shadows. Before this bar of justice, small transgressors are haled for offences ranging in gravity from a peccadillo, which brings twinkles of amusement into the eyes of bystanders, to crime so grave as to wring all hearts with its evidence of childhood's capacity for sin. The writer beheld small Jimmie G., arraigned for "disorderly conduct," which turned out to be "swinging on the gate," and "refusing to go away" when told; following Jimmie (dismissed by Judge Olmstead with a fatherly scolding, on his promise not "to do so any more") came a lad held for stabbing another, who was dying! In the first twenty-three sessions of the Court, five hundred and ten children, ages three to fifteen, were on trial; of these, twenty-four were up for grand larceny, eighty-four petit larceny, seventeen burglary, six felonious assault, three robbery, one homicide, one attempted suicide; of the remainder, craps furnished a heavy proportion. The various trespasses on the rights of others and violations of the public sense of good behavior, which come under the head of "disorderly conduct," constituted the rest, if we except a number of little creatures taken up because found without proper guardianship, or without any guardianship at all. The writer spoke to four whose parents are in a hospital, to two whose mothers drink. Fewer girls than boys are arrested.

Reuben, an honest-looking lad, was up for Sabbath-breaking; he had been selling food in his mother's little East-side store Sunday. "Why did you do it?" asked His Honor. "My mother wanted me to." "Tell your mother, if you repeat this offence, we will fine you $20 and make her pay it. Discharged." Another prisoner is called—a tiny, pretty fellow, charged with picking a lady's pocket of $11. Sorrowfully His Honor dismisses the case; evidence is insufficient for conviction, but the probabilities are that this child is the tool of older thieves, who have him in training. "Wilson," says His Honor to the next prisoner, "you seem unfortunate in that you have no home, your mother having deserted you." "Your Honor," an officer submits, "his mother says she cannot keep him with her without sacrificing the situation by which she makes her living. He is incorrigible." He is sent to the Juvenile Asylum. Here is another child deserted by his mother, who went off to Italy, leaving him with a cousin; he is on trial for burglarizing a store in which he had worked. "It seems you cannot get along anywhere," says the Judge. "Why did you leave your cousin?" "He chased me out of the house." He goes to the Catholic Protectory. A pretty girl of thirteen, in white dress, long scarlet cloak, a picture hat, shading a face framed in clustering curls, is at the bar. His Honor does not ask many questions; his voice is so low that one hears few of the sad words committing her to a home for the fallen.

A little fellow with his arms full of stolen bread made a striking picture as he faced his accusers. "I was hungry," he gave as explanation of his theft. This was his second arrest; the first time it had been simply for truancy. His mother is dead; his father, an honest workingman, had to leave him to himself a good deal. The Judge sent him to the Protectory. Two little creatures—babies almost—stand before His Honor. They were found at four o'clock in the morning picking bits of food out of a garbage can; they seem to belong to nobody; they are sent to an institution for children. A boy who has made himself a neighborhood nuisance, is dismissed on his father's promise to teach him better manners.

The function of the Court, as has been seen, is paternal and reformatory. Children are committed to Protestant or Catholic institutions according to what seems to be the religious belief of the parents; or to city or state reformatories; or they are set at liberty on probation. They are at no time thrown with old and hardened criminals. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children receives them on arrest, washes and dresses them and presents them in court, and acts as transmitting agent in consigning them to various institutions. The rooms in which they await trial are in charge of kindly custodians; and books and toys are provided. The writer saw across the hall a new arrest, a boy of seven, who had been caught robbing a Broadway store. Records show that evil example and environment are largely responsible for juvenile crime. The Court seeks to separate little wrongdoers from debasing associations, to place them under good influences, and give them a chance to grow up honest men and women. God save the children!

The Nobler Choice

IN one of Olive Schreiner's strangely beautiful stories, there is the dream of a mother, who ponders the future of her child. She dreams that the bees that were flying about her head when she fell asleep are suddenly changed into strange winged beings, and one by one they approach her with promises for her child. One says, "I am Health, and if I touch the child he will never know weariness or pain." Another says, "I am Wealth, and if I touch the child he will never know poverty and want." Another says, "I am Fame, and if I touch the child his name will not be forgotten through the ages." Another says, "I am Love, and if I touch the child, in the greatest dark when he puts out his hand he shall find another hand near." But last of all, comes one with deep-lined face and hollow cheeks, who can promise neither health, nor wealth, nor fame, nor love—but only the lack of these. Yet there is one thing which this last strange visitor can promise. It is that the child shall ever follow the ideal. Suffering, martyrdom, may lie in the path, but unswerving fidelity to the right as it is seen, to the light of conscience—to the ideal—shall be the pole-star of his life, and for reward, the ideal shall become real to him. Then the mother, being wise for her child, says to this strange guardian angel, "Touch!"

Do we comprehend that vision? Would that be our choice for ourselves, or for our children? Are we willing to give to the ideal—to truth, to light, to conscience, to conviction of right and duty, our supreme allegiance at the cost of all besides? Not for us, perhaps, the actual renunciation of home or parents for Christ and the truth's sake. Not for us the tragic choice that martyrs made and that heroes suffered and triumphed in. But in some way—in our business, in our friendships, in our affections, in our manifold uses of the world, we have to choose between principle and expediency, between loyalty to the truth and submission to circumstances, between allegiance to what we know to be right and submission to what we know to be wrong. Are we ready for the nobler choice?

Coal as Fuel

IT is an old saying that there is a good side, even to affliction, if we only look for it; and it would seem as if the prevailing coal strike, much as it has incommoded and distressed the country, might even have its redeeming aspect and its salutary lesson. Geologists tell us that the natural fuel of the country is not hard but soft coal, and that while the supply of bituminous coal is practically inexhaustible, that of anthracite is liable to run out within the next twenty-five years, unless new and extensive deposits are discovered. While the area of the anthracite is something less than a thousand square miles, that of the bituminous is about 300,000 square miles. Soft coal is found in abundant quantities in thirty-five of the States, hard coal only in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Massachusetts, and in small quantities in Colorado and New Mexico. Of the one, experts assure us that there is a sufficient supply "in sight" for a thousand years to come; of the other, there is probably not enough to last a single generation.

But though there is no immediate danger of the natural supply of anthracite failing yet awhile, the stoppage of mining operations in Pennsylvania has sharply challenged public attention to the possible future necessity of substituting for hard coal some other and cheaper fuel. If soft coal be the natural fuel, there is here an attractive and remunerative field for the chemist or practical scientific investigator, to find out how the bituminous product should be prepared to the best advantage of the consumer's health and comfort. It ought to be put in such a form as to be available for general use in cities, either in furnaces, grates or cooking-ranges. Those disagreeable qualities of soft coal which have made the atmosphere of our cities hideous for many weeks past, science should overcome and eliminate. In Wales, we learn, it is compounded with other ingredients, and pressed into compact fuel-bricks with satisfactory results. Already some few attempts in this direction have been made in the West, by persons of an inventive turn. So long as nature supplies even the despised soft coal so abundantly, it is useless to talk seriously of artificial fuel. Oil has its uses, but it is hardly yet accounted safe or reliable as a fuel; gas is dependent upon coal, and is more expensive; electricity, which is destined to be the heating and lighting agent of the future, is yet undeveloped, and too costly for general use.

Let us hope that the coal strike will soon be ended, and that ere the winter snows fall, the average householder may rejoice in the possession of an overflowing coal bin, at normal prices. But the soft coal utilization problem will remain with us, and the sooner it is satisfactorily solved the better.

The New Juvenile Courts

ONE of the most hopeful innovations in our social life, of recent times, is the change now adopted in New York and other cities in the method of dealing with juvenile delinquents. In establishing special courts for trying youthful offenders, a step has been taken which promises far-reaching benefit. There is no doubt that our old system of herding a boy, who had snatched a handful of fruit from an Italian's truck, with hardened and experienced criminals, has done much to increase the ranks of crime. We supplied the great army of wrongdoers with recruits, who sometimes became the slaves of crafty padrones, in whose service they became adepts. Even when that evil did not ensue, the juvenile offender, by mere association with the veteran prisoner, learned how to steal with greater security and how to dispose of his booty. Thus our prisons were not only places of punishment, but became schools for criminal teaching, from which the pupils graduated with thorough mental equipment for a career of depredation. Many a lad, through sheer neglect, or idleness, or association with some acquaintance whom he has picked up on the street, has stolen some trifle, and being arrested, has been sent to prison, from which he emerged with the criminal stigma upon him, and with no honest way of life open to him, and no encouragement. It was a stupid and suicidal system, that ought long ago to have been abolished. Under the new method, the boy's first offence is punished in a way to impress upon him the evil of wrongdoing, and if he has already developed a propensity for wickedness, he is sent to a reformatory, where more vigorous methods are adopted to eradicate his evil propensities. How many of our worst criminals might now have been honest and law-abiding members of society, had this system been adopted by an earlier generation! It is the ounce of prevention which proverbially is better than the pound of cure.

Women and Church Work

NO pastor, were he as wise as Solomon and as consecrated as Paul, could carry on the work of a modern church alone. He must have helpers. Theoretically the whole congregation are helpers, but the men are usually too busy or too indifferent, outside sessions, committees, and vestries, to do very much, and so the main burden falls on the women. They do not consider it a burden. To many devout women, their church work is really their life's principal zest and flavor, outside their home and the management of their children. The department chosen depends on the woman's taste and training. Naturally, the missionary societies, home and foreign, enlist the women of a church, and incidentally, faithful attendance on their meetings, does much to educate the members, for a good deal of conscientious study characterizes the women's missionary societies. A wide-awake pastor who should organize correspondingly active missionary societies among the men of his church, set them going and keep them going, would quadruple the contributions of his people to the church boards, in a single twelvemonth. My people do not consider, and do not give, because they do not know.

Women are adepts in the art of raising money to pay church debts. The bazar, the supper, the fair, enlist the women, and afford scope for their activities. Because they are accustomed to spreading dainty meals at home, they can get up wonderfully appetizing dinners and suppers for a crowd. Because they enjoy making pretty fancy articles, they can organize and carry on a fair, and make it pay, to the marvel, sometimes to the useful marvel, of the men-folk, husbands, fathers, brothers, whose hands must dive deeply in their pockets that booth and stall may be successful.

Women in church work are very much inclined sociability, and so they visit newcomers—the stranger and the friend from another church; they call on the sick and the bereaved, and constitute for their ministrations an unofficial staff of excellent unpaid assistants. Their fidelity to him is often personal, as well as derived from the office he holds. A popular pastor is sometimes embarrassed by the too open admiration of the women of his flock, no manly man caring to be made absurd by an enthusiasm which exploits him in season and out of season.

Certainly, if one may judge by the attendance at the midweek prayer-service, the women of a church, outnumbering the men three to one, are its strongest supporters. We would suggest that they bring their boys to be their escorts at evening meetings. If the boys can sing, let their young voices swell the volume of praise. We are too much in the habit of setting the young and old in places apart. The Young People's meeting, the Old People's—but we forbear to use the latter adjective. Our women might improve matters here.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

A Patriot's Warning

—I PRAY that our nation may not copy the crimes of the nations that have perished, and our cup of blessing turn wormwood, and, like them, we go down. I am by nature and by grace an optimist, and I expect that this country will continue to advance until the world shall enter millennium. But be not deceived! Our only safety is in righteousness toward God and justice toward man. If we forget the goodness of the Lord to this land, and break his Sabbath and improve not by the dire disasters that have again and again come to us as a people, and we learn saving lessons neither from civil war nor raging epidemic nor drought nor mildew nor scourge of locust and grasshopper; if the political corruption which has poisoned the fountains of public virtue and beslimed the high places of authority making free government at times a hissing and a byword all the earth; if the drunkenness and licentiousness that stagger and blaspheme in the streets of our great cities, although they were reaching after the fame of a Corinth and Sodom, are not repented of, we will yet see the smoke of our nation's ruin; the pillars of our National and State capitals will fall more disastrously than when Samson pulled down Dagon; and future historians will record upon the page bedewed with generous tears the story that the fre nation of the West arose in splendor which made the world stare. It had magnificent possibilities. It forgot God. It hated justice. It hugged its crime. It halted on its high march. It reeled under the blow of calamity. It fell. As it was going down, all the despoticisms of earth, from the top of bloody thrones, began to shout: "Aha! so would we have it!"

Sowing the Wind

—SIN is a luxury now; it is exhilaration now; it is victory now. But after a while it is collision; it is defeat; it is extermination; it is jackalism; it is robbing the dead; it is stripping the slain. Give it up to-day—give it up! Oh, how you have been cheated on, my brother, from one thing to another. All these years you have been under an evil mastery that you understood not. What have your companions done for you? What have they done for your health? Nearly ruined it by carousal. What have they done for your fortune? Almost scattered it by spendthrift behavior. What have they done for your reputation? Almost ruined it with good men. What have they done for your immortal soul? Almost insured its overthrow.

A Brotherly Appeal

—YOUNG MAN, be master of your appetites and passions. There are many young men of fair prospects. Put your trust in the Lord God, and all is well. But you will be tempted. Perhaps you may this moment be addressed on the first Sabbath of your coming to the great city, and I give you this brotherly counsel. I speak not in a perfunctory way. I speak as an older brother talks to a younger brother. I put my hand on your shoulder and commend you to Jesus Christ, who himself was a young man and died while yet a young man, and has sympathy for all young men. Oh, be master, by the grace of God, of your appetites and passions!

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

THE NEW CUSTOM HOUSE

WITH simple ceremonies, the corner-stone of the new Custom House for New York was laid on October 7, by Secretary Shaw of the Treasury. The new building is to occupy the site on the Bowling Green, which was once covered by the Government House erected for President Washington, but which he never occupied. It was burned in 1815. The site has been purchased for $2,200,000. The building is to be of Renaissance architecture, filling the space bounded by Whitehall, State, and Bridge streets, and Bowling Green. The Bowling Green and Bridge street sides of the structure are parallel, and are 200 and 269 feet in length, respectively. The structure will be decorated with many fine carvings and sculptures. It will take about two years to complete the building. In a cavity of the corner-stone a copper casket was placed, containing a set of United States coins, a number of newspapers and documents, and a photograph of the present Custom House in Wall street. In the course of the ceremony of laying the stone, ex-Secretary Gage gave a brief history of the changes that have taken place in the customs arrangements since 1783, when a small office in Water street was large enough for the business, to the present time, when a building of seven stories, containing an aggregate floor space of nearly eight acres, is required. Mr. Gage concluded his backward look with a look forward. "The patriotic optimist," he said, "may be well excused if his imagination is warmed with visions of greater achievement in the years to come, visions of a better civilization, a more prosperous state, in which a more general education, a higher virtue, social and civic, shall keep step with a new and ever increasing advancement in material wealth and power." The Christian patriot will echo Mr. Gage's hope, with the added prayer that as a nation we may fulfil the conditions which God makes for the national blessings he has promised.

If thou shalt hearken diligently to the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments, the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth, the Lord shall command the blessing upon thee in thy store-houses and in all that thou settest thine hand unto (Deut. 28:1, 2).

Surgeons in Error

A patient in a hospital at Cleveland, O., died recently under an operation, which would not have been performed but for a mistake that was made in an X Ray examination. The patient had come to the hospital a day or two before, in great alarm, over the loss of a set of false teeth from his lower jaw. He said that they had disappeared while he was asleep, and as he was sure he had them in when he lay down to sleep, he concluded he must have swallowed them. The doctors examined him, and failing to locate the teeth, placed him under the Roentgen rays. The radiograph and the fluoroscope both revealed an obstruction in the œsophagus, which the surgeons at once concluded was the missing teeth. An operation was decided upon, and was promptly performed. The stomach was opened, and a thorough search was made, but the teeth were not found. The wound was closed, but the patient collapsed and soon afterwards died. As he breathed his last, a servant arrived from his home bringing the missing teeth, which had been found under the man's bed. He had not swallowed them, and the fatal operation need not have been performed. It is astonishing that, in spite of the extraordinary precaution of using the rays, the mistake should have been made by which the man lost his life. How many have lost their souls through similar errors. They have thought they must undergo penances and sufferings by which to win the salvation that is provided freely in Christ for all who come to him in faith:

To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness (Rom. 4:5).

A Poem in a Grave

During the excavations now being made at Abusir, a Greek town formerly known as Basiri, several tombs of ancient date were discovered. In one of these, which proves to be 2,400 years old, some pieces of wood and leather were found, which had evidently once formed part of a writing-desk. In the tomb was a skeleton, the hand of which still clutched a roll of parchment. It was covered with writing, which, on being examined, proved to be an ancient poem, no copy of which was known to be in existence. It was a poem by Timotheus, the Milesian poet, entitled The Persians. Scholars at once identified it as the poem recited by Pylades at a rear of the church building, and has long been needed to allow the building to be enlarged. The owner, however, declined to sell. He is said to be an agnostic and has some reputation as a philosopher. He was therefore opposed to the doctrines taught in the church, and had no disposition to aid it by selling it his land. Ultimately he proposed a peculiar bargain. It was, that if the pastor of the church would listen to a series of lectures to be delivered by the owner, he should be paid at the rate of twenty dollars an hour, the money to be reckoned on account of the purchase. The proposal was accepted, and the pastor has attended on the days appointed, and has duly listened to the owner's lectures. The time was noted on each day, and has aggregated eleven hours. The owner gave a receipt for $220 and the church has paid thirty dollars in cash, which makes up the $250 which was the price set upon the land. It must have been painful to the pastor to listen to friends legatees to the extent of three thousand dollars each. Among them was the Post Office clerk in question. A few months ago he was visiting the old gentleman, and when he left, he readily undertook to mail a letter to a Chicago firm, which his host handed to him. It happened that the letter was important, and when the Chicago house failed to act on the instructions contained in the letter, the writer was indignant and denounced them. They replied that they had not received any such letter, but shortly afterwards wrote again, saying that it had just been delivered, and enclosed the envelope, the stamp on which showed that it had not been mailed until three weeks after it had been handed to the Post Office clerk. The old gentleman did not complain to his forgetful friend, but he promptly made a new will, in which the Post Office clerk's name did not appear among those of the legatees. It was a severe punishment for a slight offense, but the testator probably thought it was an indication that his friend was not so mindful of him as he should have been. Little things often serve as indications of character. Christ, himself, called attention to this rule:

He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much (Luke 16:10).

BRIEF NOTES

During the first five months of this year, 515,936 copies of the Bible and Bible portions were sent into China.

The Eskimos now have their own translation of the Bible, which the Bible Society of Denmark has the honor of publishing. It is 150 years since the work was begun, by the translation of one Gospel.

Lord Strathcona, of Canada, in conjunction with Lord Mount Stephen, have given to the King's Hospital fund a capital sum, the interest on which will provide a perpetual income of $80,000 a year.

Dr. Jacob Chamberlain's many friends in this country will be glad to hear that the report of his death is authoritatively contradicted. The devoted chief of the Arcot Mission has indeed been seriously ill, but his physicians now give hopes of his recovery.

The license of the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Island of Tutuila, our new possession in the Samoan Islands, has been revoked. It is now against the law to send liquor there. Our Vice-Consul made a vigorous protest against prohibition, but it has been overruled.

One of the teachers in a mission school in Bombay has recently studied medicine and received a diploma. She has been very successful in treating several difficult cases among native women, and her fame has spread. Last year she had over three thousand patients.

Princeton Theological Seminary, of which Dr. F. L. Patton is now president, will receive upwards of a million dollars under the will of the late Mrs. Winthrop of New York. It is possible that when the affairs of her estate are finally settled, the bequest will be found to be worth a million and a half.

The Woman's Union Prayer Meeting, held at 10.30 A.M. every Thursday in the Second Collegiate Church, Lenox Avenue and One Hundred and Twenty-third Street, New York, opened for this season on October 2. Its object is the deepening of spiritual life regardless of denominationalism. All women are cordially welcomed.

A nurse in an Irish Hospital being in need of rest, her place was taken by Lady Hermione Blackwood, who volunteered to serve until the nurse was completely restored. Lady Blackwood is daughter of the late Marquis Dufferin and of Lady Dufferin, whose hospital work in India earned her admiration and love of the women of India.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been conducting revival meetings at East Norwich, Long Island. Copies of his work, Early Conversion, were circulated among the young people previous to the opening of the series. It is hoped that large accessions will be made to the membership of the churches as the result of God's blessing on the work.

The Amity Theological School, 312 West Fifty-fourth street, New York, has issued its annual prospectus. As its sessions are held in the evening, it offers a rare opportunity to young people who are engaged in business during the day. All information may be obtained by addressing Rev. Ralph W. Kenyon, D.D., at the above address.

Gen. Funston, commanding the Department of the Colorado, in his annual report just issued, deprecates the great increase of drunkenness in the regiments under his command. The number of court-martials for the offence last year was double the number in the preceding year. He attributes the sad change to the fact that since regimental canteens were closed, many saloons, conducted by unprincipled men, have been opened just outside the reservations, and as they are not under his control, drunkenness is encouraged there.

SECRETARY SHAW LAYING THE CORNER STONE OF THE NEW YORK CUSTOM HOUSE

public festival held to celebrate the victory over Machanidas, the Spartan tyrant. The fact of the recitation was known, and also that it was greeted with loud applause, but the poem seemed to have utterly disappeared, and although scholars have searched for it, no one had found it until the grave at Abusir was opened. It is not known who was buried in the grave, but if it was not Timotheus himself, it was evidently some one who admired the poem so much that it was buried with him. Though nothing is known of him, some idea of his character may be formed from the contents of the poem. It is so with those who love the Bible; it becomes incorporated in their lives.

Ye are our epistle, known and read of all men (II. Cor. 3:2).

Paid for an Audience

A church at Bridgeport, Conn., is now the possessor of a lot measuring thirty feet by one hundred, which it has acquired in a novel manner. The lot is situated at the utterances such as might be expected to come from such a man as is described; but happily they would not do him the harm that they might do to people who knew less of the truth. He would take the apostle's advice, which so many reject for any novelty of teaching:

Continue thou in the things that thou hast learned, and hast been assured of knowing of whom thou hast learned them (II. Timothy 3:14).

The Cost of Forgetfulness

Many persons have been obliged to plead guilty of forgetting to do a promised service, but few have paid so heavy a penalty for the lapse of memory as has been paid by a clerk in the Post Office of a country town in New York State. An elderly bachelor of considerable wealth resided at some distance from the town. He had a large number of friends whom he delighted to entertain at his hospitable mansion. A few years ago he made his will, in which he made several of these

THE STORY OF "THE GIDEONS"

By a Gideon of Boston

RECENTLY there appeared in one of the Boston papers the following advertisement:

WANTED, a man with lots of brass, who cannot be turned down and who won't take "no" for an answer. One with a superabundance of cheek can secure a lucrative position on the road, on an exclusive commission basis. Address for further information, ———.

A man who could meet the requirements of such an advertisement would, in the estimation of many, be a fair type of the average commercial traveler—a fellow with a bold front, audacious, quick-witted, insistent and persistent in pushing his line, not stopping at misrepresentation; a swearing, drinking, gambling and pleasure-loving fellow, earning good money and spending it with a lavish extravagance. Forty years ago the above qualifications (?) portrayed, alas, too many "gentlemen of the road." But, thank God! conditions have greatly changed for the better.

I am a commercial traveler of some twenty-five years' standing. My duties call me all over the United States. Last July, in the pursuit of my business, I reached Chicago and stopped at the home of a Christian brother, who one day asked, "Would you like to attend the Gideons' meeting at Willard Hall at noon next Saturday, since the banks close at twelve o'clock that day?"

"Who are the Gideons?" I asked.

"I SPOKE A CHEERY WORD TO HIM"

"Why, have you not heard of them? They are an organization of Christian traveling men, who are banded together to recognize the Christian traveling men of the world with cordial Christian fellowship; to encourage each other in the Master's work; to improve every opportunity for the betterment of the lives of their fellow travelers, business men, and others with whom they may come in contact, scattering seeds all along the pathway for Christ. It is composed of members of evangelical churches, who believe in Jesus Christ as their only Saviour."

The answer to my question immediately and profoundly interested me, and Saturday found me in the large hall of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, located at the corner of LaSalle and Monroe streets. Upon being introduced to the leader for the day—a bright, big-hearted business man—I was cordially invited to the platform as an active participant in the services. Some seven clean-looking, intelligent, earnest and joyous gentlemen were grouped there. Promptly to the minute, the meeting was opened with hearty singing, followed by devout and definite intercession. A brief portion of the Word was then read, after some five pointed, brief Gospel talks were given, full of force and fire. The addresses were characterized by a freshness, a directness, a fervor and holy intensity that carried conviction to many hearts. I fell in love with the boys at once, and speedily enrolled myself as an applicant for membership in the Gideon ranks.

THE BIRTH OF THE MOVEMENT

This unique movement was born of a special Providence. At a hotel in a little town in Wisconsin, about three years ago, two traveling men, entire strangers to each other, owing to the crowded accommodations of the house, mutually agreed to occupy the same room. Just before retiring, one of the men unlocked his grip and took from it a Bible, which he opened and began silently to read. The other man, having discovered what his roommate was engaged in, said, "I thank the Lord that I have fallen in company with one who is evidently a Christian, and I suggest that you read aloud and that we have a season of prayer together." The man gladly complied, and after reading they bowed, together and had a blessed season of communion with God. These two traveling men were no longer strangers, but, through the instrumentality of God's Word and their meeting before the throne of grace, had been drawn together into the sweetest and most enduring fellowship on earth. The two, recognizing what a blessing this recognition of kindred interest had been to them, thought a plan could be devised whereby all Christian traveling men might be able to recognize one another for mutual helpfulness and service for the Master. The two men referred to were John H. Nicholson, of Janesville, Wis., and S. E. Hill, of Beloit, Wis.

The organization, which was the outgrowth of this meeting, was formed July 1st, 1899, by three men, but to-day it has a membership of fully 2,400, and, from present indications, promises to become one of the greatest and most efficient organizations of modern times. Chicago Camp No. 1 has a membership of nearly 300. Think of the power for good embodied in that number of wholly consecrated business men.

THE GIDEONS AS CHURCH WORKERS

As a means of recognition, each Gideon wears upon his coat lapel a gold-plated button, bearing the design of a white enameled pitcher with a blue background. From the mouth of the pitcher shines the golden flame of a lamp. The men are all traveling evangelists, each one standing in his allotted place, ready and glad to witness for his Lord. Many of them have had most remarkable conversions. Each Lord's day the Chicago Gideons have entire charge of the services in one or more churches in that city. This form of service was not of their seeking, for they are not preachers, or orators; but the pastors and leading laymen speedily recognized the efficiency of their work and invited them to become active heralds of the King's message to their fellow-men. The second Sunday in August of this year (1902) eight different services were conducted by them in as many different churches in the city. On the morning of that day it was my privilege, in association with three others, to conduct a service in a Reformed Episcopal church, which meeting created so profound an impression that the rector and his wardens made earnest application that the Gideons take charge of both services on a Sunday in September. The same evening ten of the brethren had committed to them a large union service held in a Presbyterian church. The following Sabbath an all-day meeting was arranged for them in a Baptist church, to which every Gideon in Chicago was invited, and for whom ample entertainment was provided. Precious fruit is gathered as the outcome of these meetings. The first Sunday night in each month is regularly set apart for a Gideon service in one of the largest Methodist Episcopal churches. In connection with the August monthly service a young lady and a young man were both saved.

THE GIDEONS "ON THE ROAD"

The advantages and blessed opportunities of such an organization can best be illustrated by the following experiences:—After working the city of Milwaukee, my next point was Fond du Lac, Wis. The train was late getting in, and upon my arrival at the hotel I went immediately to the dining-room, fearing lest I should be left supperless. I was placed at a table at which two gentlemen were already seated. Glancing at both of them, I caught the gleam of a Gideon button on the coat of the man to my right. Leaning toward him, I asked, "How are the Gideons over your way?" To which he cheerily replied, "Good, thank you. How are they your way?" "Oh, happy on the way." An earnest conversation was immediately commenced, to which the third gentleman wonderingly listened. At length he curiously inquired, "And who are the Gideons?" My brother replied, "They are a band of Christian traveling men." With a supercilious curl of the lip, and contempt in his voice, the outsider commented, "Christian traveling men! And where do you find them?" The answer was humbly given, "By the grace of God, and the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ, here is one." The stranger then argued, with considerable warmth, that "it was impossible for any traveling man to be a success and at the same time be a Christian. That business was business and religion was religion, separate, distinct, and unmixable."

An animated discussion arose, and the stranger's position was so completely refuted and its fallacy so thoroughly exposed, that he conceded that if one were out and out for God, and had a strong moral backbone, it would be possible to do business along straight lines. It subsequently developed that my brother Gideon was a wholesale lumber agent from Madison, Wis.

HOW A SINNER WAS WON

As I had never previously visited Fond du Lac, I took an early walk the next morning for the purpose of locating the banks, and while I was walking down the main business street, I noticed a gentleman standing in the middle of the sidewalk intently watching my approach, and when I was opposite him he suddenly extended his hand, gave me a hearty grip, and greeted me as a "brother Gideon." Then there approached another Gideon, the partner of the first, a man whose conversation was about as remarkable as that of the apostle Paul. Last winter this gentleman was sent to LaCrosse, Wis., to transact some important business involving a large amount of money. Upon reaching that town, instead of giving the business his immediate and undivided attention, he entered upon a protracted spree, and squandered large sums of money in dissipation. When Sunday night came he had retired to his room, and was on the verge of delirium, when he was aroused by the sound of music near by. Some one at the piano was playing hymns, some of which he recognized. After a time, his mother's favorite hymn was played. Conviction seized him; he could no longer rest upon the bed. He arose and staggered in the direction of the parlor, where he found a man seated at the piano, who seemed to make the instrument speak. Approaching him our friend said: "Those are hymns you are playing." "Yes, I love to play them." "Then you must be a Christian." "No, I used to be." "Well, then, come to my room. I am full of trouble, and I want to talk to you, and get your advice." The two went to the room, and there our friend told of his wilful, wicked, sinful life, and besought the other to pray for him. But this poor fellow also was out of communion with God, and he could not pray. When our brother was left alone the burning, raging, craving for liquor seized him, and in very despair he cried unto the Lord in his distress, asking Him to rid him of the appetite. God answered, and eradicated the longing for alcoholic beverages, so that he has had no desire for them since. Before the week ended, our friend was out in the light of God.

OUT OF A BAD BUSINESS

In the town of Eau Claire, Wis., while sitting at the breakfast table, I noticed a young man who looked discouraged and downhearted. I spoke a cheery word to him, and he requested the privilege of a chat after breakfast. Out upon the sidewalk he told me the story of his troubles.

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

Mrs. Carrolton's Party

DAN CARROLTON was the despair of a half dozen successive teachers. The lad seemed clever at play, but he could not learn to read, write and cipher. Those black eyes roving round the class; those stubby fingers too clumsy for the pen; that inattentive mind, which could not fix itself on the sums in mental arithmetic, were hopelessly inadequate to the demands of the school-room. Dan was not intractable or even mischievous; he simply could not and did not learn a single thing. He was the booby of Number Twelve, and Number Twelve regarded him with shame.

You see what made it worse was that Dan came from the finest house in the ward. He was by far the best-dressed boy in the "male" department. The word "male" had not gone out in the days of which I am writing. His father, a successful building contractor, shrewd and capable, had risen from the ranks, was, he boasted, wholly self-made; his mother had once been a cook, and had never bothered herself over books. She still concocted dainty dishes, but was never at a loss for conversation when her friends called, being complacent over her rich carpets and soft chairs, and quite too ignorant to know that grammar mattered much. Daniel, her oldest born, inherited her good-natured contentment, and missed his father's capacity. The other children were brighter, and did fairly well at the public school.

Daniel was rarely promoted. Finally a teacher took him in hand, who resolved that he should no longer stand still. Miss Burt kept him in, not as the other teachers, as a punishment, but that she might carefully tutor him. She toiled early and late, devoted her Saturday mornings to him, and won his affection. The boy's dull wits sharpened; the slow faculties were awakened; he began to see into what had puzzled him, to be interested, to make advances. Miss Burt felt repaid when she found her pupil at last able to hold his own with others, and pleased to see the dawn of a new manliness come into the heavy face.

As for the mother, good Mrs. Carrolton, her joy surpassed words. She bade Daniel invite Miss Burt to a party, and the party was, though the teacher did not know it, wholly a compliment to her. The minister was invited, and his wife and sister; all the teachers, all the neighbors, the dressmaker and milliner who enjoyed Mrs. Carrolton's patronage, and the firemen, who had their house a block away. It was a motley assemblage, but in the big drawing-room there was ample space for its accommodation, and as the people were town-folk, and knew one another well, they had a beautiful time. As for the supper, its like had not been seen for many a day in that simple, rather plain, vicinage. There were a magnificent roast turkey, a splendid ham, cakes of every toothsome variety known to the home confectioner, blanc mange, and ice cream, with bon-bons and candies in unlimited profusion. The welcome was as cordial as the supper was lavish, and every body sat down to eat it. The Carroltons would have scorned a standing-up supper.

At the climax of the meal, when the ice cream, in goblets, was served, and the company were gaily chatting, Mrs. Carrolton rapped on the table for order.

"I now have a surprise," she said: "We never expected no teacher to cram any learnin' in our Dan's thick head. He's a good boy, but he ain't got no brains to speak of. Miss Burt has managed to give him a good start. Me and Mr. Carrolton appreciate her efforts, and we've had this party to tell her so. She's a right-down smart little schoolmarm. And now I've got a present for her. Dan, you step right out, and give this to Miss Evelyn Burt, with your best bow, sir, the way I showed you."

Forward stepped Daniel, blushing, and handed Miss Burt a little box of chased silver. Opened, it was found to contain a hundred dollars in gold.

After this, the evening passed merrily. Presently it was time to go home. Miss Burt was standing by the table in the back part of the room, displaying her shining treasure, when, reaching across the argand burner, to recover the box from some one who had been examining it, her flowing sleeve caught fire. There was a pause, then a shriek of terror, but before any harm was done, that lot of a Daniel, from whom nothing was expected, sprang forward, tore the sleeve from Miss Burt's arm and crushed it in his hands, and, quick as

AN EASTERN BEAUTY

Sumptuous and brilliant, with dark eyes, raven hair, and glowing cheeks, she still has not the gladness of a woman born under colder skies, and in a Christian land. This Eastern beauty can never know the freedom of her sisters here. Men have been most unfair to women in the lands of the Moslem. "I will have words with our prophet when I get to the other world," said a Hindu woman, contrasting the lot of her people with the condition of women in England and America. Beautiful dresses, and fine jewelry cannot confer happiness, when the mind is empty and the life is hopeless and dull.

lightning wrapped a lounge cover closely around her, and held it fast. Beyond a slight burn on her round arm, and a blister or two on his rough palms, no harm was done.

Then forward strode Daniel Carrolton's silent, grizzled father, and held out his hand to his son.

"My boy," he said, "I'm proud of you. You'll get on. You've got presence of mind, sir. You're no numb-skull. You're my boy, a chip of the old block. I'm glad you saved the little schoolmarm, and I'm glad you know enough to do a thing when it ought to be done."

Daniel never made much of a scholar, but he is today a successful and respected citizen and an honorable business man.

Subjects we all Discuss

PEOPLE all over the country talk familiarly about the President at the breakfast table. One would think him the well-known friend of the family, so keen is the interest in his recovery from illness, so eager is every one for the latest news from his home. Mrs. Roosevelt does not watch beside him alone. In spirit the women of the land, and the men, too, are at hand sharing every vigil, the latter growling affectionately at his indiscretion in knocking about on battle-fields and taking long railway journeys, when he had so lately been jumbled up in a dreadful accident to his carriage. "Why doesn't he stay at home?" exclaims the man of the house; "Presidents have no right to take such risks." "But he's Teddy," pipes up the seven-year-old boy, as if that accounted for the whole thing.

Next we all discuss the lack of fuel in our cellars. Pretty soon we shall have to canvass the propriety of burning up our old tables and chairs, if the strike goes on. Not a fraction of a ton of coal for money to-day in a region where householders have always had their cellars stocked in the early autumn, and Jack Frost coming! "I am sure the poor will suffer frightfully this winter," says Bessie, tenderly. "The poor won't suffer any more than the rich," declares her sturdy brother Ned. "For once we are all in the same boat, and we shall feel the pinch of poverty. We shall have colds and pleurisies and rheumatism and pneumonia, and know how Mrs. Peary felt when she went with her good man to find the pole."

So the talk goes on. Pretty soon the President, let us trust, will be well and the strike over and life resume its even tenor, but there will be by that time something else for us to talk about. We are one people, though composed of heterogeneous elements, and we talk, quite often, about the very same topics.

"He was Reading a Book"

Thus naively the newspapers told us how Mr. Roosevelt beguiled the tedium of enforced confinement to his couch, after the surgical operation which he recently underwent. Mr. Roosevelt is a successful writer of books, and it goes without saying that he is a successful reader, too. The successful reader is the man who gets great good from a book, to whom a book speaks, for whom a book has a message. If I could choose among gifts with which to endow a baby at its birth, a love of reading would take precedence of most other presents. The one who enjoys a book is never lonely, for a book will bear him company. He is never without resources, and cannot feel the pressure of ennui. The book one cares for is like the comrade who makes the rough road smooth, and the acquaintance who cheats the dull hour of its dreariness. Books harvest the experiences of the ages. They fit into every mood. They sharpen one's wits. They enable one to converse brightly and agreeably. They make one well-informed and ready for the occasion. The habit of skimming a page with divided attention is not reading, it is merely killing time. When one reads, one should pay the author the compliment of heeding his words, precisely as when one listens to a talker, one does not look away and indulge in absence of mind. Neither should one thus treat a book.

That Boy of Yours

A certain father had a habit of saying to his wife, when displeased with their son's behavior, "I wish you would talk to that boy of yours!" When he was in an ordinarily happy frame, this good man said "That boy of ours," and when especially proud of the lad's achievements, the phrase would be, "That boy of mine." There was a good deal of human nature thus displayed, the husband disclaiming the son's faults and blaming the wife for them, also throwing on the mother the burden of reproof, and pluming himself most manfully, on the junior's cleverness, when he did well, as if that part came from his side of the house.

JUSTICE AND MERCY * CITIES OF REFUGE

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 2
JOSHUA 20: 1-9

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT — "GOD IS OUR REFUGE AND STRENGTH, A VERY PRESENT HELP IN TROUBLE." PS. 46: 1

VER the plain a manslayer is running for life. He is dressed in shepherd's garb, but he has cast off nearly all of his garments, that he may run the faster. He hopes to reach the city of Bezer, just ahead, before the avenger, who is pursuing hard after him, can seize upon him. The gate of the city is flung wide open, and once within its portals, the shepherd has nothing to fear, for he has not committed murder. In protecting his sheep against wolves, he threw his heavy club, and it struck Nathan, one of his assistants, and killed him. The avenger is Othniel, the brother of Nathan. He is animated, not so much by a spirit of revenge, as of justice.

Another manslayer is running for life pursued by an avenger. In this case, the manslayer is a soldier. He was engaged in a mimic encounter with a brother soldier, and struck so hard a blow that death followed. The avenger is the cousin of the slain man. Just ahead is the city of Ramoth Gilead. The manslayer will lose his life if the avenger overtakes him before he reaches its open gate. The manslayer does reach it, but only by two paces in advance of his pursuer.

Another race for life is before us. We can tell by his garb that the manslayer is a shepherd. His garments are bloody. He has been in close combat with the man he has killed. Will he reach the city of Golan, just ahead, before the avenger can seize upon him? Oh! he trips and falls just before he reaches the gate, and he is slain by the avenger. It would have been the same very shortly if he had succeeded in reaching the city, for he would have been found to be a guilty murderer by the judges, and they would have delivered him to the avenger to do his deadly work.

What do we see now? The city of Kadesh, and two men are running for life, each pursued by an avenger. How strong they all look! By their swords and by their garb we know them to be soldiers. One manslayer seems to be spurred on by the other. Now they are seen to run abreast, and yet they are careful to keep far enough apart, so that they will not trip each other up. They do not stop running even at the open gate, but their strength carries them several paces beyond. The avengers, too, pass within the gate; but they must not lay hands on the men they have chased, unless they are found by the judges to be guilty of murder. Let us hope that in each case the killing may be found to be an accident.

We are standing at the gate of the city of Shechem. Darkness is coming on and we can hardly see, but we hear the noise of swift running, and suddenly, almost as an arrow, a man speeds by us and enters the city through the ever open gate. The avenger is not a minute behind him, and more bloodthirsty than usual he seems, for he knows that he has a case. He gains his breath, and tells the judges. This man is a most quarrelsome fellow; he is always in trouble with some of his neighbors. He has been known to sow tares in a neighbor's wheat field, and even to remove his neighbor's landmark to increase his own possessions. "We will try this case to-morrow," say the judges, "until then let both of you rest in peace."

We turn our eyes to the south, and see a man of noble bearing being closely followed by an avenger, also noble in appearance. Both are making for the city of Hebron. They are panting for breath because they are running up hill. The manslayer reaches it in safety. The judges are at the gate, ready to investigate the case. They find that the killing was by accident, and they say to the avenger, "You must depart," but to the manslayer they say, "Your life is safe only while you remain either in this city, or within a close distance, one thousand yards beyond. If you go further than that, we cannot protect you against the manslayer. Here you must live until the High Priest dies, after that you can go where you please."

Let us open our Bibles now and read by whose authority cities of refuge were appointed and maintained. Let us read Num. 35: 9-15, and Deut. 19: 1-13, and Joshua 20: 1-9.

Illustration and Application

1. How the cities of refuge established justice.
2. How they illustrate divine mercy.

The first and direct lesson of the cities of refuge is a lesson of justice. There is so much preaching and teaching and singing about mercy, that we are in danger of underestimating justice in God and man. In many a court, judge and spectators might well have ever before them on the wall, the motto:

Too much mercy is want of mercy.
And spoils more life.

And in the judgment seat of our own hearts especially, where we are daily judging our fellows by their acts, without due consideration of motive, we need to study the rude justice of the Cities of Refuge, whose message is that the act is measured by its motive. When the American War of Independence was concluded, the thirteen States, which were very jealous of each other, and almost like thirteen independent nations, sent delegates to form a "Constitution," a code of national law, whose purpose they stated in the preamble to be "to establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity," etc. So when the twelve tribes of Israel had conquered and divided Canaan, their leaders remembered Moses' command, that they should establish justice and ensure domestic tranquillity among these rival tribes by various provisions, of which the Cities of Refuge was chief, inasmuch as it protected life itself. This it did in three ways, all on the basis of justice, not of mercy. First, it reaffirmed God's law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by him shall man's blood be shed" (Gen. 9: 6). If a man had wilfully killed another he fled to the City of Refuge in vain. He would there be delivered to the pursuing vindicator of justice, the nearest kinsman of his victim, who in those rude times was the appointed executioner of the guilty. But justice was again safeguarded, by providing that if a man had killed another accidentally, as hunters often do when, in shooting at game, one kills a man, then the absence of evil motive should find due consideration in the court of the City of Refuge. And yet, because even accidental killing or killing without malice, almost always implies guilty carelessness, which needs some reproof for the general good, the man who had so slain another must not only make a desperate run for life, but must remain, at the loss of home and business, in the refuge city, till the death of the High Priest. It is a pity that in our more civilized days we could not put to similar inconvenience the man who "didn't know it was loaded" when he pointed a gun at his friend, and the automobile killers and others, whose recklessness is hardly better than malice. "I didn't think" is not a good excuse. A man should not use his head only for a hat rack.

WHOSOEVER KILLETH ANY PERSON
UNAWARES MIGHT FLEE THITHER AND NOT DIE

Let this thrilling story of the fleeing manslayer teach us, first of all, the preciousness of life. We must not destroy life whether by murder or by carelessness, not even by "killing time." Life is God's gift in trust, each day a dollar in a purse to which no addition shall be made, and he is squandering trust funds from God who wastes a "year of our Lord," or even a day or hour. Let the lesson story teach us, second, the grandeur of justice. Luke 4: 18 promises that justice shall reign when "Jesus shall reign." The Gospel is a promise of social justice as well as of divine mercy. Emerson personifies the final triumph of justice:

My will fulfilled shall be.
For in daylight as in dark
My thunderbolt has eyes to see
His way home to his mark.

But even in this lesson's picture of justice there is a hint of mercy in its emphasis on motive, which is reached in Burns' familiar lines:

Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman;
Though they may gang a kennin' wrang,
To step aside is human;
One point must still be greatly dark,
The moving why they do it!
And just as lamely can ye mark,
How far, perhaps, they rue it.

The City of Refuge is not a type of Christ, for it shelter only the innocent; but it is an effective illustration, partly

A Nearer

Refuge for All contrast, partly by resemblances, of the soul's way of escape from sin and its consequences. First, let us note that every soul is guilty of sin and needs a refuge (Rom. 3: 23; 6: 23); second, that the refuge Christ offers for all, even the most wilful sinner, on repentance (Eze. 18: 21); third, that the refuge benefits only those who seek it and remain in it (Jer. 6: 16); fourth, that the refuge is near that the weakest can reach it by one step of the way (Psa. 34: 18). The man who had found safety in a refuge city must remain until the death of the High Priest, but Christ our High Priest never dies, and his sacrifice of himself, which satisfies justice and makes way for mercy, benefits only those who abide in him. And here let us take the first step to the eternal refuge, by adopting the following Y.M.C.A. covenant for converts:

"Forsaking every known sin, and making the Word of God my guide, I take and will confess Jesus to be my Savior and Lord, the Holy Spirit to be my helper; and this I do deliberately, unreservedly and forever."

Alas that so many neglect the warnings God gives, calling us to flee from sin and its present and future consequence. Just before Mount Pelee overwhelmed Martinique with a flood of death, a commission of scientists had examined and declared there was no danger. They are in like case who bid men have no fear of hell, though the gentle Christ has warned us that it will overwhelm all who wilfully refuse the refuge he offers.

Up in the wild bog lands of southwestern Ireland, there lived a family named Murphys. A vast amount of rain had fallen that summer in the whole county of Kerry. All the mountain streams were swollen. Most of the rivers were unfordable. In three months of that year there were only six fine days. The Murphys, inhabiting a lonely cottage on the side of an immense stretch of moorland, had been warned that the continual wet was undermining a bog close to their house. "Isa the turf movin' under my feet," said one lad after another, as they came in from herding the few goats and sheep scattered about, brought in creels of the fuel they had extracted from the rich, red, brown earth. "I will be dhruvin' down our way unless the Almighty bees sendin' us some finer weather. But all such warnings were unheeded. Most frequently the lads were rebuked for "meddlin' wi' the ways of Providence." "It's fine soft weather the day, God bless it. We'll be safe enough in the shanty as our fathers were before us."

One morning to that part of Kerry came a learned man. He had come to take note of the rain gauge, and make some scientific experiments in the neighborhood. He warned the Murphys of what might happen. "Water has got under the bog," he said. "Some day it will slide, and then your farm will be no where." "By the blessin' of God," answered the man he addressed, "we're far enough away from the bog not to mind if it does. But I'll keep a watch, and thank your honor kindly." Alas! the poor Murphys soon forgot all the warnings they had received. The rain went on, and one morning a boy flew panting into the farm. "The whole bog is sliding," he shouted. "Escape for your lives while there's time!" As the slight figure disappeared round the brow of the hill, the owner of the farm dragged himself to the door to see the wonder that was happening. Seemingly a river of thick red earth was creeping toward him. In reality, the bog was traveling with amazing rapidity. Before the terrified family could make their escape, the whole semi-liquid mass had run up to their house, and meeting with resistance from the strong stone walls, just mounted up, until the roof tree was covered and the whole homestead submerged. A servant on an adjoining dyke saw the whole catastrophe, and was powerless to lend a helping hand. All she could do was to rush to the highest point on the mountain side, and wait till she was rescued. So God is saying of the wicked, "Their feet shall slide in due time," but they reply as they go on in sin, "God is merciful. We don't believe he could punish anybody; and in any case there's time enough yet." "A deathbed repentance," they whisper to themselves, "will be enough, and we'll have a good time for a while." This disposition is not a novelty. Long ago, the people to whom the prophet Ezekiel was sent, said: "The vision that he seeth is for many days to come and he prophesieth of times that are far off." But they shall reap the thorns they sow even in this world, which was made by a good God for good men, and all others are going against the universe and will get the worst of it. "The way of transgressors is rugged."

There were many roads to the Cities of Refuge, but there is only one Way of salvation for the sinful soul, and that is through Him who said, "I am the way," "I am the door; by me if any man enter in he shall be safe." The first name of Christians was "Those of the way," and a common name of Christianity in heathen lands is "The Jesus way."

He was representing a certain company, and in the prosecution of his business he found that fully seventy per cent. of the sales were made to saloon proprietors, and that in order to make a sale, the saloon keeper first had to be "bought." He had become convinced that as a Christian young man he could no longer continue the business. We went together to his room, and after I had counseled him I asked God to strengthen the boy for every good word and work, to give him special grace and guidance, and when we arose from praying he announced his determination to get into something that was honorable and honest. Before we parted, I had the young man's application for membership in the Gideons. He is a member of a Presbyterian church in Dayton, O.

night ten of us held a service in a Methodist church in Minneapolis, and after the meeting it was difficult to get the people to leave the church. It is really marvelous to observe the interest aroused by these saved business men, as they introduce and commend the Lord Jesus to their audiences. There is a freshness, a directness and a power in their work that is wonderfully quickening and inspiring. Their language is plain, pointed, and easily understood. No labored, involved, or intricate sentences; no flights of rhetoric, no trickery of oratory, none of the falsetto inflections of elocution characterize their speech. As their success in business largely depends upon their getting right down to plain facts and figures, and carefully avoiding any circumlocution, so their and there is room everywhere for its use among the churches as there was for Mr. Moody's work. Mr. Moody was himself a traveling salesman, and but for his work the Y. M. C. A. would not have had its wonderful history. That association has given up union evangelistic work, and the Gideons have come to the rescue of that special grace of the Master, and as salesmen will always be needed, and charge nothing for their services to Jesus Christ as Gideons, I don't see why that organization may not more than make up for the loss to the churches of the Y. M. C. A. co-operation in union work.

CONVERTED ON THE RAIL.

The national organization publish a journal, The Gideon Quarterly (a ten-cent paper), and the last issue contains a full and interesting report of their annual convention at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, July 4-6, 1902. The whole town was stirred for God from centre to circumference. Many conversions took place. At one of

After transacting business with the President of one of the leading banks in St. Paul, he remarked, "You are a Gideon, I perceive." "Yes, sir." "Well, so am I. I became a member while I was bank examiner for this district."

A WESTERN GIDEON CAMP.

At Minneapolis, there is a Gideon Camp composed of many of the most prosperous business men of that city and St. Paul; among them a general book agent, a wholesale dealer in piping and plumbers' supplies, a banker, representatives of dry goods jobbers, wholesale grocers, millers and other lines of trade. In this camp is one of the sweetest Gospel singers in the land, a man running over with the joy of the Lord. One Sunday work for the Master is patterned along the same practical lines. They are less interested in the style of their talk than in results. They will take nothing for their services even when going to considerable distances, practically illustrating the truth that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." They and theirs are all for Jesus.

That noble Christian merchant, the Hon. John V. Farwell, of Chicago, who was the staunch and life-long friend of the late Dwight L. Moody, and who has been a prominent and efficient factor in the success of the Y. M. C. A. work in that city, in a letter to the writer, dated Sept. 19, 1902, says:—

the hotels the elevator boy was converted; stopped his elevator between two floors, fell upon his knees, and was led to Christ. The train carrying many of the delegates was detained at a junction. An open air meeting was held on the depot platform, and the conductor was converted.

The national secretary, John H. Nicholson, of Janesville, Wis., will gladly give more definite information to any interested Christian traveling man, or to any brother traveling man who is not saved but who wants to be. Brothers, come over and help us; the Master calls for you; we need you in our ranks, and you need our companionship. May God bless every one who reads this story of the Gideons.

The Career of an Impostor

Prince, the Founder of the Agapemonites and Forerunner of Piggott, "the False Messiah"

AN English journal of recent date gives the following interesting account of the career of Henry James Prince, the founder of the Agapemonites, the notorious sect to which Piggott, the "false Messiah," belongs. Prince was the forerunner of Piggott. He was born in Bath, England, in 1811. "He was intended for the medical profession, but afterwards entered the Church. Having entered it, he was sent as a curate to Charlton, where he found at first very unimpressive material for his restless and ambitious spirit. The farmers and the quiet hurch-going shopkeepers resented his novelies in worship, and strife began to wage in families, and some rioting in a church that had lain asleep for centuries. Wives threatened to leave their husbands for ever if they prevented them from trying to save their souls by listening to the inspired accents of the young curate; husbands swore they would kill their wives if they entered those night orgies of religious intoxication. He was removed to Stoke-in-Suffield, but was again expelled from his cure in the Church.

"Prince then set up an independent chapel at Brighton, but left to go to Weymouth; gathered his little flock, and gradually he reached the point of unveiling his whole gospel. Then came the project of finding a fitting home for the select body which he had gathered round him. Asceticism of surroundings, of food, of occupation—in any shape whatever, except in the relation of the sexes—had no place in Prince's creed. He resolved that there should be a lordly pleasure-house in that quiet and tranquil Somerset valley in which he had first preached the Gospel.

"To carry out this project of an Abode of Love, or Agapemone—as the new settlement was to be called—money, and a large amount of it, was required. Prince had married twice—in each case women who were elderly and had money. The second wife had an annuity of eighty pounds; she handed it over to Prince. A man named Maber and his four sisters subscribed between them £10,000, but even yet there was not enough money for this modern palace of Aladdin. And then came Prince's boldest stroke. An ex-tanner of Bermondsey had five daughters—all unmarried, all elderly, each entitled to £6,000. Three of them were early and devoted adherents of his, and he easily succeeded in getting their money—£18,000 for the Agapemone, or lordly pleasure-house, at Spaxton. And Spaxton, beyond doubt, was a lordly pleasure-house! The hills around are clothed with chesnut, oak, and fir; the land used to be fat with corn; the woods rich with game. Here, secluded from the world, surrounded by women, one extremely young and beautiful, all fair to look upon, Prince lived remote from the madding crowd, dreaming strange dreams. He had thrown, by this time, all concealment away, and openly proclaimed himself a New Saviour, whose second coming had been expected for so many centuries. And in pursuit of these claims, Prince was guilty of one of the foulest things even in the history of religious impostures.

"Among his disciples was a Mrs. Patterson, a widow of some wealth, and when she died at Spaxton she left behind her a daughter. The fate of this poor innocent girl was too tragic to be told in detail. Suffice it to say that Prince, a married man, professed to be united to this girl spiritually, and that the offspring was denounced by Prince himself and his adherents as "Satan's offspring—Satan's doing in the flesh." It may be taken for granted that no remorse haunted the visions of the religious impostor, and no doubt entered the minds of most of his dupes. He lived to the age of eighty-seven; undetected, unconfessed, adored to the last. And so passed away one of the most successful and one of the most curious impostors of our time."

Conversion of Marshal Bulow

I find in my dear mother's diary for the year 1827, the following item, which seems to me likely to interest many:—"At the battle of Waterloo, a Marshal Bulow greatly assisted in the final victory. (He joined Blucher, and headed the column that came to the aid of Wellington.) He afterwards became a true Christian; gave up all his military glory, and devoted himself to preaching the Gospel over Europe under the patronage of a London Missionary Society. At one of their annual meetings, he gave up all his trophies of valor to be disposed of for the spread of the Gospel, and with the humility of a child, yet possessed of great courage and perseverance, labored to enlist soldiers for Christ." My mother remarks that if those anxious to quench the fighting instinct in man would succeed, they must spread the Gospel among all tribes and nations. If ever the lion and lamb lie down together, it will be when "the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the earth as the waters cover the sea." His example is worthy of imitation by our valiant soldiers of rank and file.

LI HUNG CHANG'S PALACE AT PAO-TING-FU

afire with Boxer hatred. It was to be our task to visit these remote stations, unravel the story of their martyrdom, compensate the native Christians and landlords, and erect monuments, in addition to holding public funeral services where the missionaries fell. All these matters were to be discussed in Taiyuenfu, with Shen Tun Ho, at our discretion.

Shen sent letters and couriers on in advance to all the cities along the highway of 900 li to Kuei Hua Cheng, the northern capital; arranged for pavilions to be in readiness for funeral services, in a dozen large cities; gave instructions for monuments and cemetery sites to be provided; and appointed assistant Chinese delegates to further the work of remunerating native Christians, etc. A banquet in the name of Governor Ts'en was tendered, and proved a most enjoyable and memorable occasion.

Shen posted us as to matters in the north, in a frank, friendly way, that was appreciated by us in the extreme. The Provincial Government had already loaned or paid large sums to the converts all over the province. Buildings were being rebuilt at their own expense, and cemeteries made, according to a newly enacted statute, with caretaker's cottage, well for watering flowers and shrubs, monuments as desired. We carried with us a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing the letter in Chinese sent during the famine, and exhibited it oftentimes on the way; also the beautiful photos of our banquet, the officials, and scenes along the route. They proved an "open sesame" in many a conservative yamen; and an unfailing source of interest and delight.

We wound out of this city of the plain, after a week's rest, and with a new weiyuen, the assistant of Judge Ch'en. We had left a beautiful copy of the Scriptures for the Governor, similar in design and type to that presented the Empress Dowager; also a handsome American illuminated edition to Shen Toatai. We send a portrait of this enlightened Governor Ts'en, with his two children. In the photo taken at our banquet, the officials are in rich sable fur robes. They doffed these at table, and were attired in elegant embroidered silks, that remind one of the High Priests in the Mosaic economy. Buttons of various material and colors ornament the hat, to denote various degrees of rank. Shen Tun Ho's was a large crimson jade stone, dashed with a tinge of milky white. The soul of this Chinese statesman has not yet burst its bars of superstition. He has, however, worked indefatigably in mission matters, and all is arranged satisfactorily as far as can be done.

We had, after leaving Taiyuenfu, to cross mountain ranges. The people in the interior were unaccustomed to foreigners, as they had not the advantages of those living on the more traveled highway from Taiyuen to Pao-tung and Peking. The officials were not so friendly nor the inns so pleasant. After leaving Taicheo, we stopped at "Stony Place," a wee hamlet, and, as was often the case on this unfrequented road, dispossessed the chief villager of his homestead for the time being. The little family walked out, and the furs, table draperies and dishes of the mandarin, supplemented their best, while a royal dinner was prepared, and we walked in.

With a brilliant retinue of mandarins on white horses, and soldiers and cavalry, we entered the city of K—. We rode through the long streets, and were received at last in the ample compound of the restored Mission Home, now the Foreign Bureau. It was Saturday afternoon. We were surrounded by a throng of people, and surrendered ourselves to the task of making our needs known. The old evangelist Wang and Kao-Ta-Lin now took charge of us, to guide us safely through all our stations. It was a busy two weeks' work to go west four hundred li and return, visiting four stations; then south one hundred and fifty to another. In Kueihuacheng, we visited and restored (on paper) the desecrated cemetery, erecting suitable monuments; held service on the street, 5,000 people attending; also in the chapel, overflowing with onlookers; visited and photographed the Taotai and his sons, and the ruins, and rebuilt mission premises; then had a good-bye meeting and dinner and "communion" with the converts. This programme was essentially the one carried out in P'ih-kets-i, Salats'i, Paoteo, Toketo, Fengcheng, Yangkeo, Tungchingtze and Tatungfu.

Finally Kalgan, the city on the border of the Great Wall, formerly in our own Chili Province, was reached. We had unravelled the tale of our heroic Mission band, little by little, and the story is one of the most thrilling and inspiring on the China field. We inspected sealed rooms, where the debris of household furniture and boxes of Gospels were covered with the dust of silent months. The Gospels we appropriated and sowed broadcast. It was with hearts full of love and admiration for their lives, that we had monuments reared to the workers, in the most beautiful spots we could select, and engraved, "Till Jesus comes." They have left imperishable monuments of their occupation of North China, in the native church.

We had a third weiyuen in Tatungfu, a fine city near the boundary. We followed the same route taken by the Empress Dowager in her hasty flight from the Capital to Hsien; sometimes the same suites of rooms were given us, and the memories of the fleeing Court still seemed to haunt the shadowy apartments. The Great Wall skirted a part of the road—magnificent ruins of architecture and masonry, crowning the heights. Telegraph wires and poles were winding in and out of the same ravines and on hill-sides. The light will sooner or later penetrate this vast region, over which we trust the iron horse will soon be speeding missionaries and others, in as many days as we were weeks. Our work was a revelation of possibilities in inland China.

GOSPEL TEXT WORK OUTSIDE OF MANILA

STRANGE SIGHTS IN MANILA

Filipinos Welcome the Gospel with Processions and Bands of Music

FOR a long time, there has been a very definite move on the part of the Filipinos to form a church of their own, whether the Augustinian Friars went or stayed. Before the coming of the American flag it was an impossibility to do more than wait. From 1890 to 1898, any one who journeyed through the beautiful province of Luzon, and many of the Southern islands, would have found a universal move on the part of the natives to drive out their enemies, the friars. This took vigorous form, and the people summarily pulled down many of the massive and costly churches, so that the going of the friars might be assured.

While traveling through these same provinces in 1900, ruins of churches were seen on every hand. We knew that our American troops had recently fought their way through these provinces, and we at once concluded that thisanton destruction of these large buildings might have been the work of our soldiers.

"Oh! what ruin! What a disgrace!" we mourned. "Oh, that our army had never come here."

Some intelligent Filipino gentlemen heard us, and with eagerness came forward.

"Did you say you thought the American army had torn down these buildings. Oh, no! Our soldiers never did this. We ourselves did this. We ourselves destroyed these churches. It was our only possible way to drive out our enemies, the friars."

To our exclamation of surprise at this seemingly extreme action, their only answer was: "You Americans have not understood, or you would have helped us when you came. We see you do not understand yet. Our despair has driven us to extremes. It was our only way. We do not wish to leave God; but we can never again worship God in these churches."

These poor people for long years had been fighting against hope. Their cries had pierced the skies, and the God who can interpret roans and sighs as the most effective prayers, turned their captivity." There are no more resurrecto camps in mountain fastnesses. The Philippines are in a more peaceable condition than they have been for one hundred years. The Filipino has an opportunity, for the first time in many generations, to look about him, and quietly plan a future for his country and himself. Public schools are being rapidly multiplied all over the islands. The handful of missionaries in and about Manila find the Filipinos, who have so recently come to possess Bibles, eager to understand them. Evening classes are formed that meet in several different centres. After a hard day's work in their offices or stores, men and women of half years, meet after 8 P.M. to study their Bibles, with the missionary as leader. Then portions, carefully unfolded, are carried by these eager men and women to small gatherings of their own neighborhood in mid-week prayer meetings, or for Sabbath services in some distant town. Often the evening services are so interesting that they are continued past midnight.

Missionaries who can leave Manila are often called to go to towns in the distant provinces. A letter recently received from Mrs. Bessie White Jansen, a missionary in Manila, says: "A short time ago, we preached in a provincial town. There were many who accepted Christ as their Saviour, and who determined once to proclaim this Gospel to their neighbors. The most zealous were Filipinos of the intelligent class. After the missionaries had gone, these eager converts consulted how best to assure good audiences to the meetings they desired to hold. Their past experiences in religious services had all been confined to those of the Romish church. They remembered the dazzling processions at nightfall, with gorgeously-robed priests, and tinselled figures of life-size saints, carried on the shoulders of men. Such processions were heralded by martial music, the whole spectacular scene being brilliantly illuminated by torches and transparencies. Such processions were frequent, and served to draw the populace into the churches. Now, the devoted Filipino converts decided that, in this new departure, it would be well to proclaim in no uncertain terms their belief, and the marvelous changes that had come to their land. Why not adopt the time-honored custom of music and transparencies? Accordingly, for the first mid-week service, the town's best band, pealing forth military music, headed the procession, followed by the leading Filipinos. Each one bore large transparencies in forcible Tagalog. These transparencies announced:

"The truth formerly withheld from us by the friars is now to be made known." "Truth which all should know." "Come to-night and hear God's truth."

It is needless to say that the cockpit where that meeting was held was crowded to its utmost capacity. The place where men gambled away their hard-earned money, was now a place of prayer.

In another town, an elderly Filipino of education and standing among his people, showed a Bible to his friend, and said:

"You know I have left the church. I have no religion. This is all I believe."

He had for years suffered persecution from the friars. Now he counted himself as having no religion! The religion of his people had always been Romanism. Now he had found peace by reading God's own Word!

In a suburb of Manila, where the evening classes have grown rapidly, several have said to their missionary, Mrs. Jansen, "If we could have a little church building that we could know is all our own, we could more easily gather the people into one place. We will bring stone, and mortar and bamboo. Those of us who are masons and carpenters will give our services, and more will give money as well, but you know we are a poor people; we have been robbed in the past, and as yet we have not recovered. Do you think there are people in America who are willing to help us in building?" These Filipinos should have a church they may call their own.

The Christian Herald in Oklahoma

My son went to Oklahoma early in the spring, in a section void of church privileges. I sent him THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for his own benefit. A Sunday School was organized in the neighborhood. My son carried the copies of your paper to the school, and at once they were formed into a circulating library, and thus they go from home to home every week. Now the people are talking of building a church house. They have no minister, but the good work goes on.

The Red Letter Bible a "Marvel"

After carefully examining the Red Letter Bible received some time ago as a premium with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I must say that I am perfectly delighted with it. It is a marvel in every respect. In the Old Testament, I am particularly impressed and highly pleased with the Scarlet Star leading or pointing to the Christ. This arrangement of the matter cannot fail to create a renewed interest in the reading of this part of the Holy Writ. The Art Portfolio has also been received and is highly appreciated.

"Modern Eloquence" as a Guide to Success

EVERY young man wants to succeed. How? Obviously, the way to learn is to study the methods of men who have succeeded.

Guides to success are many. What do they say? Be honest. Tell the truth. Work hard. Save money. Do $20 worth of work for wages of $5. Such advice is good no doubt, as far as it goes,—but is not something more needed? Did these methods alone make HILLIS, and BOK, and REED, and CARNEGIE, and CURTIS successful?

Young men are not fools. They see that there is a secret of success, and that it is more than honesty and hard work, else every honest hard worker would be successful.

The secret lies in controlling the minds of men. How to make others believe in you, trust you, and do what you wish,—this is what you must learn. To be sure, few will learn it but those who also work hard and tell the truth. These come first,—but they are not all.

As a guide to the highest success, "MODERN ELOQUENCE" has no rival. It is a splendid series of object-lessons by masters in the art of influencing men's minds. And the success aimed at is far more than mere money success. Fame, power, honor, the gratitude and love of generations to come,—these are the rewards which have spurred to such efforts the men whose words are gathered in these ten rich volumes.

In MODERN ELOQUENCE the men who have won success in every line speak for our instruction:—

In Law, there are Evarts and Phelps, both the Choates, Coudert, and David Dudley Field.

In Journalism, Dana, Halstead, Watterson, McClure, McKelway, and Whitelaw Reid.

In Politics, Cleveland and Harrison, Blaine and Conkling Sumner and Seward; we listen to the eloquence of Gladstone, then to that of his great rival, Disraeli.

In Literature, we have the best thought of Dickens and Thackeray, in contrast with the more modern humor of Howells and Mark Twain; or Carlyle, Frode, and Morley speak to us from across the sea, for comparison with our own Emerson and Curtis.

Among the heroes of War, are Grant and Sherman, Sampson and Schley, Miles, Wheeler, and Lew Wallace.

Among great Educators, are Presidents Eliot, Gilman and Hadley.

Among great Scientists, Huxley and Tyndall, Herbert Spencer and Agassiz.

Among successful men of Business, are Carnegie and Depew, E. W. Bok and Cyrus W. Field. President Eliot's address on the "Uses of Education for Business," and Gladstone's "Modern Training for Life" are guides for the beginner to learn by heart; and Bok's lecture on "The Keys to Success" is of the greatest practical value to every young man ambitious to succeed.

COFFEE VISE.

Holds Fast Until You Get a Knock-down.

"I had used coffee moderately up to six years ago," writes a lady from Piney Creek, Md., "when I was seized with an attack of nervous prostration, and was forbidden coffee by my physician. I was constantly under treatment for nearly three years. After my recovery, I once took a cup of coffee, and it made me so sick I did not want any more.

After the nervous prostration, my stomach was very weak, so that I had to be careful with my appetite. As soon as I would eat certain things, I would have an attack of stomach trouble sometimes lasting several weeks, so when I was attacked by erysipelas two years ago, my stomach was immediately out of order.

I kept getting worse until nothing would stay on my stomach, not even rice water or milk, and I was so weak I had to be fed with a spoon. I had a craving for something like coffee, but that was impossible, so Father went to town and got some Postum Food Coffee, and when he asked the doctor if I might have it, he quickly answered, 'Yes.' Mother made it exactly as directed, and brought me a part of a cup and it was delicious, satisfied every craving, and best of all, stayed on my stomach without distress, giving comfort instead. For several days I lived on Postum, gradually increasing the amount I took until I could drink a cupful. Then I began to take solid food with it, and so got well and strong again. I now use it constantly, and I am entirely free from my stomach trouble.

Father and Mother both use it. Coffee made Mamma nervous and disagreed with her stomach so that she would taste it for hours after drinking. Father had stomach trouble for five or six years, and used to be deprived of various articles of food on account of it. Now he can eat anything since he quit coffee and uses Postum. Father says that it is better than Mocha or Java." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Library of Eloquence

IN these days, where education is essential to success in life, no matter what one's calling may be, and when every young man and woman aspires to be "somebody" in their own particular circle, the art of speaking in public is more and more widely cultivated. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have written to us, from time to time, inquiring how they might overcome their inability to speak acceptably before an audience. They have ideas, and they know what they would wish to say; but at the critical moment, the power of expression seems to be denied them. General Grant once said he would gladly surrender all his military honors, if he could only make a good speech. There are thousands upon thousands like him in this respect.

To all who aspire to mental culture, and especially to those who desire to become good conversationalists or public speakers, the new work entitled Modern Eloquence, issued from the press of a Philadelphia firm of publishers—John D. Morris & Co.—will be most cordially welcome. It is something that has long been needed, and it is not surprising that it has already become famous throughout the English-speaking world, as a standard educational work of the highest literary merit. The editor, Hon. Thomas B. Reed, and his eighteen distinguished editorial associates, in these ten handsome volumes have produced what is the equivalent of a hundred ordinary private collections. It is the very flower of the erudition of the world's leading minds during a century, and its possession makes the owner master of all the most brilliant, learned, cultured and eloquent orations, speeches and addresses of this highly cultured age.

What a "feast of reason" is here spread before the appreciative reader! Here one can enjoy what the brightest minds have thought and said on every conceivable subject of human interest. All the splendid eloquence of the legislative chamber, the platform, the pulpit, the banquet hall is here assembled, classified and indexed, and not one subject of paramount interest has been left untouched. Here are marshalled the romance, the tragedy, the pathos, the wit of those geniuses whose names are foremost over all the globe amongst public speakers. Here are all the drolleries and the famous stories that set audiences in a roar; the glowing perorations that moved the souls of men; the humor and sarcasm that cut like lances; the speeches that have made history. Science, art, invention, politics, statesmanship, religion, history—each is represented by its collection of oratorical masterpieces. It was Gibbon who said of Cicero's addresses, that each was in itself "a library of reason and eloquence," and here, in these ten handsome, compact volumes, are many such libraries available for immediate service. Over 5,200 topics are treated, affording the widest variety for selection, and suited to all tastes, from the famous parliamentary oration, to the gay after-dinner speech, coruscating with witticisms and studded with pungent epigrams. To read and enjoy them is a liberal education. To be able to draw upon them for inspiration, is to be equipped for any emergency which a person may have to face, where speaking or writing is demanded. No matter in what channel your taste may run, you may here indulge it with profit to yourself and with pleasure to all with whom you come in contact. Is your home circle an intellectual one? Here is a perennial fountain of entertainment. Are you a member of a debating club? Here are all the great debates of a century, ready at your service as models, and you can inform yourself on every topic under the sun. Do you wish to become a ready speaker at church or town meetings, at political gatherings, at social assemblies, or at any of the hundred-and-one occasions, where ready, well-informed address is appreciated? Here is the best of monitors, with whose aid even the most ordinary speaker will cease to be commonplace, and by which he may, with slight effort, discover the secret of delighting audiences and moving them at will. Here is the most exact information, expressed in the most felicitous way—a happy combination of education and eloquence. Volumes I, II, and III, contain all the great after-dinner speeches of the nineteenth century. Volumes IV, V, and VI, give the most famous public utterances by great thinkers, delivered on the lecture platform and elsewhere. Volumes VII, VIII, and IX, include the great addresses of the century; those that have become world-famous and which marked the highest flights of oratory. Volume X, is devoted to reminiscence, repartee, and famous stories of the banquet hall and the legislative forum. Every volume is finely illustrated with portraits. The letter-press, paper and binding are of the first quality, and the entire set of ten volumes is issued in handsome and durable form.

It is told of Henry Clay, that his first speeches had for auditors the stable-boys and the cattle. Others have begun modestly in church meetings, at the social club, and in little local assemblages. It has been aptly said, that if every woman desires to be beautiful, every man secretly wishes for the gift of persuasive language. Contrast the ready speaker, well-informed, fluent, and at his ease, with the one who struggles in his delivery like a ship laboring in a gale of wind. Still, even such conditions may be overcome by cultivation. He who studies the splendid array of models in Modern Eloquence, is utilizing forces that have proved invincible in many a mighty battle, and which, no matter in what channel his vocation may lie, will make him a stronger, abler, better man, with a broader intelligence and a more comprehensive grasp of the great problems of the day.

Esther Mather. A pleasing story by Emma Louise Orcutt; deals with attractive phases of American life. Pp. 218, cloth bound. Grafton Press, New York, publishers.

Mother Goose Paint Book. Issued by the Saalfeld Publishing Co., Akron, O., is one that cannot fail to please the young folks. It combines art training with amusement, and can hardly fail to be a popular volume with those youngsters who are fond of making or coloring pictures. Price $1.23.

His Story: Their Letters. By F. D. B. This is a clever little history of the progress of a courtship, told in a succession of letters, mainly in dialogue form, the incidents taking place in France, though the principal characters are American. It is bright and entertaining throughout. Pp. 141; cloth, with frontispiece. F. J. Drake & Co., Chicago, publishers.

Studies in Hearts. By Julia McNair Wright. This new book of delightfully written short stories by this well-known author, will be cordially welcomed. She is always entertaining, never misses the point, and has the happy faculty of knowing a good story and how to tell it. Pp. 100, illustrated, cloth covers. Price 75c. American Tract Society, New York, publishers.

Ratapan, a Rogue Elephant, and Other Stories. By Ellen Velvin, F. R. S. A book that is sure to delight the young folks, while it will also interest the old. It contains many beautifully-told stories of animal life, that convey much of the charm of Seton-Thompson's works on the same subject. Illustrated by Verbeck. Cloth binding. $1.25. Henry Altemus, Philadelphia, publisher.

Prayers for Public Worship, Private Devotion and Personal Ministry. By Abbie C. Morrow. The well-known author of numerous good books. This large and diverse collection of prayers and devotional readings is wonderfully uplifting and devotional in spirit. This little volume will commend itself to all who love good devotional reading. It will stimulate Christian feeling and prove helpful and uplifting for the cast-down and sorrowful. Cloth, $1; superior cloth, silver edges, $1.50; fine leather and red under gold edges, $2. M. E. Munson, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

The War in South Africa, Its Cause and Conduct. By A. Conan Doyle. Whatever other object Dr. Doyle may have had in view when he wrote this book, it is clear that its primary purpose is the justification of England in the eyes of Americans. The book treats both Briton and Boer impartially. Dr. Doyle supplying data for the verification of his statements. W. G. H. Koenicker, who fought on the Boer side, read the book while a prisoner in Ceylon. He says: "Dr. Doyle weighs each party's share in the bringing about of the war with admirable impartiality and fairness." Pp. 139, paper cover. McClure, Phillips & Co., New York, publishers.

The Tree Doctor is the title of a book by John Davey, of Kent, O., which is really a most valuable manual for the practical arboriculturist and for all who love nature, whether they live in city or country. Mr. Davey writes as one thoroughly familiar with the subject. Not only does he explain, in simple terms, the best methods of tree surgery, but he tells how trees may be raised well and kept well, how the most desirable results may be produced in lawns, orchards, avenues and woodlands, and also how to deal effectively with ornamental shrubbery and flowers. The chapter on landscape gardening and flowers is one of the most fascinating in the book. The Tree Doctor contains 167 half-tone illustrations, pp. 88. Price $1. Published by the author at Kent, O.

Down in Water Street. The story of sixteen years' life and work in the Water Street Mission. A sequel to the life of Jerry McAuley, by Samuel H. Hadley. No one is so well qualified, by experience, to write the story of this remarkable mission as Mr. Hadley. This is by far the best book on rescue work that has been published in recent years. It is a real life story, told in a simple and unaffected way, that carries with it to the reader the conviction of absolute truth. One may search books of fiction in vain for characters as unique as "Old Uncle Reub," "Pop Lloyd," "Bowery Ike," and "Billy Kelly." In a future issue, we will notice the book at greater length. It is copiously illustrated. 242 pp.; cloth binding. Price $1. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, Chicago, and Toronto, publishers.

THE following letter has been received from Rev. J. C. Lawson, who is in charge of the Methodist Episcopal Orphanage at Aligarh, India, in which there are a large number of orphans, sixty-two of whom are being supported by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. His letter is a specimen of others which come from Baptist, Congregational and other missionaries. They show that although no less than 5,500 children are being supported in the various orphanages by our readers, there are still a large number of orphans unsupported, who might be rescued for Christ if funds could be obtained. Mr. Lawson, who is now in this country trying to obtain funds for the extension of his work, writes as follows:

REV. J. C. LAWSON

Last May the following touching incident took place in the Boys' Industrial Orphanage at Aligarh, N. W. P., India. Chunkoo, a boy of about fourteen years of age, was dying. He had been ill only a few days, but the end was near, and he knew it. Two hours before his death he called around him a number of his special friends and held a prayer meeting, himself being the leader. He said: "I am not afraid to die, I am a Christian;" and in this strain he continued to talk as his strength allowed him. At last he shouted, "/ai, jai, Yhu."—"Victory to Jesus!"—breathed his last and was sweetly asleep in Jesus. Four years ago this dear boy was a raw heathen, and knew nothing of Jesus. Since he came to us he had developed into a beautiful character, and his life was that of a true Christian.

Among the many famine waifs gathered into the Aligarh Orphanages during the famine of '97, was a little boy about six years of age by the name of Munnoo. As is so often the case, he was scarcely anything more than skin and bone when he came. He was very carefully nourished after his admission to our institution, and all that could possibly be done for him was done, Mrs. Lawson herself attending to him day and night in a tiny room adjoining her bedroom. But the little orphan became weaker and weaker, until finally one night we were awakened by his singing "Yesu Masih mero prana bachaya"—"The Lord Jesus has saved my soul,"—and thus another immortal soul was rescued from eternal starvation and death.

Mrs. Lawson writes, "Tell the people in America about our rescue work. How every week women come to us of Hindus, Mohammedans, and Christians." There are over three hundred widows in this institution, nearly all of whom were gathered in during the famine of 1900. There are about seven hundred orphan boys and girls in the two orphanages at Aligarh. Those who are able to work are being taught various trades. Although I had already witnessed two famines in India, the following letter from

Mrs. Lawson, touched me exceedingly: "Our native pastor has brought in thirty-one more famine children, making ninety-three in all. For these we have no support. I have used up our own little deposit in the bank. I cannot see these poor waifs starve. One of our pastors reports that he is unable to help applicants who need food. Several starving young men he has to fight away, and has to refuse them food, for he can help only the little ones, and the widows and their little ones all have to be refused. If I had money I would take them and start a separate department. One superintendent cannot manage more. We

I accept your special offer to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Readers of Ridpath's History of the United States, and enclose 50 cents as initial payment. Send full particulars, and if satisfactory, will order the set, otherwise the 50 cents is to be returned to me.

CAUTION! We desire to warn the public against certain unauthorized so called histories of the U.S. that claim Dr. Ridpath as author. The ONLY GENUINE U. S. History by Dr. Ridpath bears his portrait as a trade mark on the title page.

NEW FEATURES IN THE NEW EDITION

In this New Edition 150 pages are devoted to the fascinating subject of Physical Geography and Statistics. Eighty pages are given to the new Census returns of 1900. These are valuable features not found in any other history.

Reads Like a Romance

No American home, however humble, should be without some readable and authentic narrative of the struggles and triumphs of that land whose name has become the synonym of liberty. Such a work is Dr. Ridpath's Popular History of the United States. It is a compendium of the stirring facts of our history woven into narrative so brilliant as to leave an ineffaceable impression on the mind of the reader. The images rise from these pages like the creatures of fiction, and the great acts of our national drama are set on the historic stage like the scenes of the Histories of Shakespeare.

"FOR 34 YEARS A STANDARD PIANO"

THE WING PIANO

You need this book IF YOU INTEND TO BUY A PIANO. A BOOK—not a catalogue—makes the selection of a piano easy. If read carefully, it will make you a judge of tone, action, workmanship, and finish; will tell you how to know good from bad. It describes the materials used; gives pictures of all the different parts, and tells how they should be made and put together. It is the only book of its kind ever published. It contains 116 large pages, and is named "The Book of Complete Information about Pianos." We send it free to any one wishing to buy a piano. Write for it.

Save from $100 to $200 We make the WING PIANO and sell it ourselves. It goes direct from our factory to your home. We do not employ any agents or salesmen. When you buy the WING PIANO you pay the actual cost of construction and our small wholesale profit. This profit is small because we sell thousands of pianos yearly. Most retail stores sell no more than twelve or twenty pianos yearly, and must charge from $100 to $200 profit on each. They can't help it.

A Wing style—45 other styles to select from

This Piano is the handsomest style made in the United States. It is also the largest upright made—being our concert grand with longest strings, largest size of sound-board and most powerful action, giving the greatest volume and power of tone. It has 7 1/2 octaves, with overstrung scale, copper-wound bass strings; three strings in the middle and treble registers; "built-up" wrest blanks, "dove-tailed" top and bottom frame; "built-up" end case construction; extra heavy metal plate; solid maple frame; Canadian spruce sound-board; noiseless pedal action; ivory and ebony keys highly polished; hammers treated by our special tone-regulating device, making them elastic and very durable; grand revolving fall-board; full duet music desk. Case is made in Circassian walnut, figured mahogany, genuine quartered oak, and ebonized; ornamented with handsome carved mouldings and hand-carving on the music desk, trusses, pilasters, top and bottom frame.

In 34 Years 33,000 Pianos

We refer to over 33,000 satisfied purchasers in every part of the United States. WING PIANOS are guaranteed for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship, or material.

Instrumental Attachment

A special feature of the Wing Piano; it imitates perfectly the tones of the mandolin, guitar, harp, zither, and banjo. Music written for these instruments, with and without piano accompaniment, can be played just as perfectly by a single player on the piano as though rendered by an entire orchestra. The original instrumental attachment has been patented by us, and it cannot be had in any other piano, although there are several imitations of it.

A FAMILY COAT-OF-ARMS

THE INDIAN TOTEMS OF ALASKA

By ADAH SPARHAWK YOUNG

AMONG the most interesting attractions to those persons who visit Alaska, are the curios of Indian handiwork. Ornamented and interwoven with symbolic designs, many of these are samples of a taste and intelligent handicraft which seem far beyond the generally accepted ignorance of the Indians and the crude conditions of their life. The work of many of these productions is tedious and toilsome, often requiring weeks of time to complete. Of paramount interest to visitors are the totem poles, which are to be seen in all the Indian towns, but are most numerous in their old villages.

The geographical distribution of totemism is very wide. Among the Indians along the coasts of Alaska and its many islands, totemism is found in its most primitive form. The Indians of the interior do not practice this custom. The word "totemism" was first used in 1792 by an interpreter, who applied the term to the practice of the Indians of the Northwest, especially in regard to their belief in animal ancestry.

The Indians rehearse many strange legends, showing their belief that in olden times men were as animals, and vice versa. Totemism illustrates, or is a material expression of their belief in the kinship of men and animals. The stories related are very old, and date from a period when, as the legends claim, men and animals could understand each other's language. The scenes of those stories are laid on the water or at the water's edge, as all the Alaskan Indian towns are built on the shore. Legends and historical events relating to the people and the vicinity in which they live, are rehearsed at their feasts and public gatherings, at which all listen with the utmost reverence.

A totem is a coat-of-arms. It is hereditary. All the Indians from Mt. St. Elias to Puget Sound are divided into two great totemic groups—the eagle and the raven. Under these two heads are numerous sub-totems. Those belonging to the eagle are the brown bear, frog, wolf, dog-fish and beaver. Those adhering to the raven are the blackfish or killer-whale, owl and halibut. Totem poles are from twenty to seventy-five feet high, and are usually carved from top to bottom with a succession of mythological emblems, figures representing fish, animals, birds and people. They always bear most prominently the figure of the totemic emblem of him in whose honor, or at whose expense the pole is erected.

This is but one of the figures and the others are a hieroglyphic version of some one or more ancient mythological legends and are, besides, a sort of genealogical record. One of the many legends, which is of the frog, runs thus: One day a boy was playing near a frog pond, when he fell in; the frogs carried him underground to their tribe. They called the chief, and debated as to what disposition they would make of the boy. The chief asked him his name, to which he replied, hihiich (frog). The chief then said that is our name. They did not wish to put to death one who might be some kin to them, but conveyed him back to his home. Thus the frog is ever one of the legendary saints. The story of the raven dates back to the beginning of crea-amount of carving done on it. It is usually erected in front of the owner's house. A Hyda Indian, of Howkan, was compelled, by the pressure of the popular opinion in his tribe, to shorten his totem pole, as it was considered higher than his rank would warrant. It being the oldest pole in town, the missionaries protested against its mutilation, but all in vain.

The totem governs the marriage relations. A man may not marry a woman of the same totem as himself, but may marry one of the same tribe, which they usually do. An Indian will not kill or eat his totem animal.

The Indians have a style of carving which is peculiarly their own, and is difficult of imitation. The Hyda's are expert carvers and possess most elaborate totems. They were the teachers of other tribes in carving, and formerly did their carving with tools made by themselves, from stone or native copper. The large wooden and horn spoons, ladles, and other household utensils, are ornamented with totemic emblems, and their jewelry is nearly covered with these figures. Masks, which are worn at dances, one for each spirit, are also skillfully carved. Into their clothing and blankets are woven, or worked with pearl buttons and beads, various mythological emblems. Their large wooden halibut hooks and long pipes are carved, and the immense pillars which support the house roof inside, are carved like the totem poles.

Dr. Sheldon Jackson has made an effort to preserve several totem poles, by placing them in the public museum at Sitka. About two years ago several business men of Seattle, purchased of Alaska Indians a fine totem pole, which they presented to the city. It stands in one of the most public squares and is considered a great curiosity. Very recently a new pole was erected in this town. The event, according to the Indian custom, was accompanied by a large "potlatch," at which three hundred blankets were given away.

These totem poles, ingeniously carved with interesting figures, attract the attention of all tourists. They are made of cedar, a very enduring wood, but many of them are defaced by time. Most of the religion of these Indians is of a material manifestation, which will perish with time. The finest pictures the artist puts on canvas will fade. Nothing done in matter is immortal, for matter is perishable, but he who works on the spiritual leaves impressions that shall endure forever.

ALASKA INDIAN MAKING A TOTEM POLE

tion, when the waters covered the deep, the beasts, the birds and the silent cities. Each figure or emblem has its strange story.

While most of the poles are heraldic, some are but mortuary sticks, marking the resting-place of the dead, and representing the totem to which they belong. These poles often contain cavities, in which are placed the ashes of an Indian chief.

An Indian's degree of dignity is judged by the character of his totem pole, including the height and

General Booth Under Fire

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD OPENS A BATTERY OF QUESTIONS ON THE SALVATION ARMY VETERAN

IT was a day of brilliant sunshine—clear, crisp, yet warm for October. General Booth, the veteran founder and head of the Salvation Army, stepped lightly under the brick arch, as he entered the room on an upper floor of the Army Headquarters in New York. "I have learned to stoop," he said, with a smile, as the suggestion was made that he should be wary of the arch.

"I HAVE LEARNED TO STOOP"

The General is over six feet tall, remarkably straight, notwithstanding his seventy-odd years, and with a fine military presence. He wore the regulation surtout of the Salvationists, which was open in front, revealing a sash brilliant with decorative work—the insignia of his rank as World-Commander-in-Chief of an army larger than that of any power in the world, and more widely distributed. His striking personality is already so well known that it need not be further described here.

Commandant Booth-Tucker and his accomplished wife, the Consul, stood beside the aged chief while THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative talked with him.

"The question of how many people have been converted through the Salvation Army since it first started is difficult to answer," said the General. "The only reply I can give is, millions upon millions."

"And among your converts," I inquired, "have there been many of high rank—many who were prominent from a worldly point of view?"

"Our converts have been connected with all classes of society. I have reason to believe that members of some of the royal families of Europe have been personally greatly benefited by the Army's operations, while members of the aristocracy—men in high governmental positions, military generals and professors in the universities, and others in the higher walks of society—have been saved. Some of them are marching in our ranks and wearing our uniform."

The next question concerned the work of the Salvation Army in the slums of the big cities.

"Our slum work," replied General Booth, "cannot be regarded as other than a great success, and only needs to be increased in order to effectively deal with the miseries springing from the misfortunes and vices of the poor creatures driven to that mode of existence."

There came to my mind the various colonies which the Salvation Army has established to afford, to some at least, a means of escape from an existence so terrible; and I asked General Booth whether the agricultural settlements in Florida, California, and other places, promised to be a success.

"I am more than ever satisfied," he answered, "that if sufficient capital was furnished on purely business principles, they would supply a solution of the difficulty at present experienced in the great rush of the people from the village to the town. Indeed, they would not only prevent this evil, but absorb a large measure of the surplus population. The influx by immigration of the poor agriculturists of Europe into the United States must culminate in great evil, if they are allowed no alternative but to dump themselves down in the overcrowded cities. Means on a large scale should at once be adopted for settling them systematically upon the land. We have done something in the direction of migrating the unemployed and the unskilled labor. We have more than 800 souls on our various colonies, and I am still hoping to see realized my dream of years ago, in the establishment of colonies in suitable locations in different parts of the world."

"General," I said, "will you tell me what is being done by your organization to limit the development of what is known as the Social Evil?"

"Much must depend on wise and prudent legislation," answered the General. "The most that the Salvation Army hopes to be able to do, at present, is to give every girl a chance of finding her way back again to the paths of virtue, and not only to give her the opportunity, but to press her to avail herself of it. In London the Army Rescue officers are coming to be well known by the bulk of the members of this unfortunate class, and in many cases the elder girls, who have given up all hope of being able to save themselves, recommend the younger ones to abandon their miserable life by availing themselves of the open door of deliverance which we offer them. During the past eight years 40,000 girls have passed through our Homes, 3,000 of whom have been in New York. This work is rapidly increasing, and we are now taking under our wing at least 7,000 girls a year. If we had means this work could be developed to a very large extent. Every year it is being managed in a less costly manner. We reckon that the saving of a girl in London, from first to last, costs $10."

"Besides women, you have many children under your care, have you not—waifs and the like?" I said.

"Indeed, yes," he answered. "We have made efforts with the children, and have already 441 Day Schools in India, attended by about 20,000 children, besides nearly 1,000 famine children in our orphanages. We are making great efforts in the way of educating these children, and they are not only taught to read and write, but to seek and serve God, so that they may in turn man from every sin, on the spot, the Salvation Army would have to close its doors, haul down its flag, and proclaim itself a dismal failure."

"Do you note any marked growth of the true religious feeling among the great masses of the people?" I asked.

"It is, I fear, with the masses in England as with the masses in all the other Christian lands," answered General Booth; "while there is in many cases improvement, in the way of education and civilization, and less of the vulgar immoralities, such as drunkenness and other vices, yet there is to be found in proportion less of that godliness which manifests itself in holy living and whole-hearted devotion to the lost."

"Do many of your converts join with churches?"

"For the purpose of maintaining and extending our work," replied the General, "and for the object of making holy, soul-saving men and women, we invite those who are saved, through our instrumentality to join the ranks of the Army; but I know as a fact that a great number of those benefited in our services unite with the churches, and become leading spirits in connection with their various enterprises."

"General," I said, "it would seem that now, more than ever before, there is a widespread longing for a great revival here in the United States. In what manner, in your opinion, should such a movement be directed?"

"To me," he responded, "there is only one way—let the professed followers of Jesus Christ humble themselves before God, renounce the world, and consecrate themselves afresh to the business of warning those around them to flee from the wrath to come."

He spoke in solemn tones, and with the dignity of an old-time prophet, who has a mission to the sons of men. His long, slender frame, once powerfully knit, but now worn by ceaseless labor, his strong, patriarchal features, deeply lined and even yet capable of expressing tremendous energy; his sweeping gestures; his voice, thrilling, pleading and caressing by turns, are all calculated to impress and influence multitudes of men.

He would cross the Continent, he said, after leaving New York. Then on to China and Japan.

"You still encounter opposition in some countries, do you not?" he was asked.

"Yes, I think we have been in jail (here he spoke for the Army and not individually)—we have been in jail in nearly all countries."

And the stern face relaxed in a smile. As I looked at the old warrior, grizzled and battle-scarred, there recurred to me the words of Paul:

In labors more abundant; in stripes above measure; in prisons more frequent; in deaths oft . . . in journeyings often; in perils of waters; in perils by mine own countrymen; in weariness and painfulness—

A little longer we talked, but the General, who had already been speaking for two and a-half hours to a crowded audience before our meeting, had to be excused.

"WE HAVE BEEN IN JAIL PRETTY NEARLY IN ALL COUNTRIES"

"THE OLD GOSPEL IS STILL, AS EVER, TRIUMPHANT!"

help to save those around them. In our various American Orphanages, Day Nurseries and Colonies, some 650 children are being cared for," he added.

"General Booth," I said, "we hear sometimes that people want a new Gospel; that the old Gospel is old-fashioned; that—"

"Not so!" he said with sudden energy, "the old Gospel is still as ever triumphant, and no other can appeal to the hearts of men. Without the doctrine of salvation through the blood of Jesus Christ for every

Back From His Mountain Tour *

Gen. Howard Reviews His Experiences
Among the "Mountain Whites" in the Cumberlands

MY expedition with Dr. Guerrant, Mr. Stark (the artist), and Miss Annie Guerrant, through Breathitt, Lee and Perry Counties, Ky., which ended the 15th of September, gave me an insight of the mountain districts of Kentucky.

For about five years, I had probed the country far and near, from Cumberland Gap as a centre, going on short journeys on horseback and by wagons up the ravines of the mountains and along the foothills. I thought I was pretty well acquainted with that part of East Tennessee, which surrounds our group of schools that we have named "Lincoln Memorial University." I had, at least twice a year during commencement week, met the young people coming from the neighboring counties of Virginia and those from Kentucky, particularly from Middleboro and Harlan County, and had concluded that we had not a better set of young folks, as to capacity and promise, anywhere in our land.

In point of educational privileges, their people had been fifty years behind the hill country of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania. I had become more and more averse to classifying them as "poor whites." I saw that they were so like all our children of Scotch and English descent, that it was unnecessary to give them any name or classification that would wound their sensibilities, or increase disabilities that are only incident to locality in their rough, almost inaccessible mountain country—the country where they were born. With my co-workers in East Tennessee, in order to change the educational situation, we have thought it best to establish a special institution which shall contribute to the betterment of conditions throughout the whole mountain region. What has kept these people back when other sections have been so prospered and advanced? I answer, first their peculiar locality. In times of slavery they were practically shut in by themselves. Their teachers and preachers have been for half a century illiterate. They have been too scattered for even the hamlet and village privileges of other sections of the country. The manners and customs and family life of the rough highlander have been perpetuated, and family and clan feuds have divided them and contentions spoiled whole communities, often ending in the death of every male member of a family, clan, or party.

Feuds Slowly Dying Out

The old idea of revenge on the part of the head of a house, originating in the system of patriarchal protection—a good thing, but capable of abuse—is hard to eradicate. Yes, it is next to impossible, except through the thorough and general education of the children and the substantial conversion of the adults to the real teaching and example of our great Master.

We have tried hard, at Cumberland Gap, to have such an industrial department as shall give the able and industrious youth of both sexes a chance for self-support and a practical knowledge that shall develop the country, and to give them also a well-equipped normal department, to furnish teachers for the mountains—teachers of the right sort. May I say it—teachers who will bring new ideas into every neighborhood or district where they teach. This work has a good foothold with us at Cumberland Gap.

Faith in the Mountain Folk

Now, my latest expedition through the Cumberland Mountains, sixty miles to the west of Middleboro, and ascending along the creeks and forks and canyons of the wonderful Kentucky River, has confirmed my faith in the mountain people, and the diligent missionaries have reached; but thousands of the canyons, the creeks, and the fork valleys haven't yet been touched.

The hospitality of the poorest log house is never wanting. The family will tender you their best. They will sleep out of doors, or in "the loft," to give you a bed. It does not do to offer money for hospitality. They did, at Turner's Fork, allow us to bring in a basket with some supplies (it was just our lunch thrown in). They cannot contribute money. The people seldom have any; but they will give land, lumber—for there is a wilderness full of that—and personal labor to help build a meeting-house, a schoolhouse or "Log College," as at Laurel Hill. Dr. Guerrant husbands every resource. He pays so little to hire toilers, that none but the most self-denying can go

They are all our own people, with the same names as those we find in our New England hills and valleys.

A Southern Problem

Yesterday, while looking over the new book entitled "Ginsey Kreider," I noticed the preface of the author. I said to my friends, "What a true characterization of the mountain people whom I have just visited, especially those in the Tennessee and Kentucky mountains." "The problem of the mountaineer (says the author) is but one of the many seeking solution, that vex the South, groaning beneath its burden of illiterate millions. But this question differs in many ways from those of the negro, the 'poor whites,' or even of the impoverished higher classes. The 'mountaineer' is no alien of race or color; no ambitionless mental degenerate; and no aristocrat, whose ideals and ideas must be revolutionized to accord with modern democracy. He is the descendant of good Anglo-Saxon pioneer stock, such as forms the brain and sinew, the nerve and muscle, the very backbone of our nation. That he is in his present state of ignorance and destitution is from no fault of his own, but comes from his isolation of all civilized centres; from his deprivation of all civil advantages; and from the denial of what should be his rights in this enlightened age—religious and educational advantages. . . . It is mainly from the North, and from the churches that help can come, for the South cannot fully care for its own." The vast regions populated by the mountaineers are themselves part and parcel of the South.

3,000,000 Neglected Souls

After enumerating several helps—as from Berea and missionary institutions—the author, with large knowledge of the extent of the field, adds: "With all these missionary efforts, but a small part of this vast region is pre-empted, and but a small portion of the 3,000,000 souls are influenced."

I fully agree with the next sentence, and would like to emphasize it: "There is urgent need of more extended operations" (Let General Howard and his confreres and Dr. Guerrant and his Soul Winners be enabled to double their work) "and most essentially need of more generous giving to redeem this people. In the claims of humanity, in honor of patriotism, and, above all, in the name and love of our Lord," Miss Oder sends out her admirable book "as an appeal for the mountaineers."

I add my voice to hers to seek the means "to recreate and uplift poor fallen humanity," and especially to save the children there, just coming on the stage of life, from falling.

It is a great and worthy object, is it not?

OLIVER OTIS HOWARD,

VETERANS OF THE CIVIL WAR EXCHANGING REMINISCENCES

strengthened my purpose to do all I possibly can for their upbuilding. But, most of all, this remarkable journey has enlarged my knowledge of what other organizations beside the Lincoln Memorial are doing, or undertaking to do. The Soul Winners' League was a strange name to me. The Inland Mission I knew nothing about. Now I see the toilers in this Kentucky vineyard at their constant work, a group at Elkatawa, Canoe, Crockettville, Laurel Hill, and other centres, where there is one store, a tent, or little log or small frame meeting-house, and one schoolhouse and one post office. Hardly a hamlet there; no village anywhere; no city, even a small one, except Jackson (and that of less than 2,000 inhabitants). These toilers bring the messages of peace. "Every child must have in his memory passages of Scripture enough to save him," said one of these toilers. That is done where into his field and stay. His highest salary for the "Soul Winners' League" for an aged missionary and his diligent helper, such as Drs. McAllister and Saunders, is but thirty dollars per month, and less for all the other "toilers" in his mountain district.

A Word for the Work

Dear readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: Every dollar you can invest for this mountain work, for enterprising and able Christian teachers right there in the mountains (as at our "Lincoln Memorial"), or for the "Log College" an institute at Laurel Hill, or for the "Soul Winners' League," will give you in time more satisfaction than I can tell you. What is needed is increased practical Northern interest in these near-by Southern neighbors of ours, especially on the lines of Gospel and educational help.

Weighed and Wanting

DANIEL 5: 27:

"Thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting"

THESE words were spoken in the Royal Banquet Hall of the most famous capital in the East. This is Babylon, beautiful, licentious, corrupt, luxurious, shameless Babylon; Babylon the pride of the Chaldeans; Babylon the wonder of the world!

Ctesias tells us that Babylon was sixty miles square. That means its area was more than one-third the size of the modern city of London, the English beehive, with its 5,000,000 of inhabitants. It was of such vast wealth, that within its central temple was an idol made of solid gold, which alone was worth over $200,000,000. Its surrounding walls were three hundred and sixty-five feet high, and wide enough to allow four charioteers to drive their sixteen chargers abreast upon the top of them, while the moon shimmered upon two hundred and fifty watch-towers and tipped with light the spears of hundreds of sentinels and shone upon a hundred gates of solid brass, which swung open to let friends in and clanged shut to keep enemies out.

Standing upon the heights of the famous hanging gardens, which Nebuchadnezzar, the king who had courted Amytis among the hills of Ecbatana, had thrown up to humor a whim of his queen, we can see off in the distance the mighty river Euphrates flowing through the midst of the metropolis and cutting the city in twain. Along the wharves of this river were daily heard the cries of the sailors unloading from the ships cargoes of merchandise and foodstuffs, as well as the gold and silver and myrrh and precious stones imported from other lands. In the centre of the capital we can also see where the engineers have gathered the waters of this mighty river into a large artificial lake, forty miles square. This lake was wide enough and deep enough to harbor all the modern navies of the world. In it all these ships of war could drop their anchors, fold their sails, and float side by side in peace.

A Magnificent City

The boulevards of this ancient city were pillared with statuary. The streets encircled the busy marts where merchants wrangled for barter and gain, or led down to the magnificent bridges which spanned the river. These bridges were flanked with palaces, where beauty and wealth loitered away the lazy hours, or sang themselves to sleep, cradled in the graceful gondolas, which gently pressed the waters into ripples or contemptuously tumbled the foam from off their crested breasts. Everywhere artesian wells tossed up the waters into fountains, shining through which the sun arched the flowers with rainbows, while birds of brilliant hue, whose ancestors had been brought from tropical climes, stopped their singing long enough to quench their thirst or to cleanse their gorgeous plumage. There in the evening hour these fountains lifted up their lips, while their cheeks blushed into a deep red for the good-night kiss of the setting sun.

But we must hurry on to-night and not linger over the scenic delights of this famous capital, for I am going to lead you into the royal banquet hall, where Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, is giving a great feast to a thousand lords of his kingdom. He is giving this feast to-night in a hall decorated with the trophies of conquest, and the triumphs of art; with the air rhythmic with song and redolent with incense; with the faces of his dead ancestors pictured upon the walls or chiseled by the sculptors in marble of purest white. He is giving this feast in a banquet hall where the sandaled foot strikes mosaic floor or sinks into softest rug; where, under the light, the precious stones sparkle and gleam, as the jeweled hand of an aristocrat pushes back the tapestry or lifts the golden chalice to the lip. The king is giving this drunken feast to show his contempt for the besieging army of Cyrus the Great, which, for nearly two long years, had fruitlessly laid siege to his capital, that seemed impregnable.

But at last, in this banquet hall at this famous feast, when the intoxicated eye became more brilliant than the diamonds glittering upon the naked throats of the assembled guests, and the flushed cheek redder than the wine cup, there appears a marvelous sight. Out of space there stretches a hand—an armless, bodiless hand. And with the finger of this strange hand for a pen, a hidden power writes there awful words of doom upon the wall of that banquet hall. It is to interpret one of those words, "tekel," which means, "Thou art weighed in the balances and art found wanting," that I am to-day preaching this sermon. I preach upon this one word, because these fatal five letters announced to Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, that night that he had to die.

God's balances always have accordant weights. He weighs every man according to the work which he has given him to do. He weighs every man in proportion to the religious opportunities that have surrounded his past life. He weighs every man with reference to the Christian home in which he was born, and to the prayers of Christian men and women which have been uttered in his behalf. God weighs a man not only with regard to his sins of commission, but also as to what he might have accomplished for God had he applied himself for his Divine Master as he should have done.

The Possibilities of Life

When God in this royal banquet hall of Babylon held high the balances with which he weighed Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, God weighed that life by a standard entirely different from that with which he would weigh the life of an ignorant, brutal, African cannibal, taught from the days of his youth that it was right and honorable to eat the roasted flesh of his captives and slaves. God placed in one of the scales of his balances, all Belshazzar's infinite opportunities for doing good, as the mighty ruler of the wealthiest capital of the East. God placed in that one scale all Belshazzar's opportunities for knowing and learning about the true God and his divine love. Belshazzar was not, as some suppose, the heathen ruler of a heathen nation. He was the grandson of the Nebuchadnezzar whose famous prime minister was Daniel, the mighty man of God. In all probability, he had heard from Daniel's own lips the commandments of the God of the Jews, and how that God had protected the prophet and closed the mouths of the hungry wild beasts when his servant was thrown into the lions' den. Daniel, at the time of which I speak, was about eighty years of age. He could have testified, and, in all probability did testify, to Belshazzar, how the love of the true God had cared for his believing child now for nearly four score years. So the word written on the wall of that banquet-hall was the record of a test. Belshazzar's opportunities of leading a godly life had been placed in one scale, and when the evil effects of the life he did lead were put in the other scale, it had gone down like a flash. That was the inevitable result. He had been weighed in the balances, and found wanting.

My brother and sister, are you ready to let God hold aloft the same balances with which he weighed Belshazzar's life in the royal banquet hall of Babylon? Are you ready to let him weigh the results of your life? "Oh no," you answer, "my life is nothing to what it ought to be, when I think of my past religious bringing-up. No one had a better and more consecrated Christian mother than I have had. No one to-day has a more consecrated praying wife than I have. Every night, even my little children pray for me, and yet I am unwilling to pray for myself, or do what I ought to do." If all this be true, then, my brother, how are you to escape the doom of him who sat in Babylon's banquet hall? You are being weighed in the balances, and found wanting.

A Father's Remorse

It is an awful and heart-rending sight to see a man stand up and confess that he has crushed out of his heart the religious influences which surrounded his early life. I once heard of an old man who arose in a great religious meeting, and, facing the audience, said substantially this: "Oh, my friends, I beg of you not to fight against the influences of the prayers that have been uttered in your behalf. If you do, you will live to regret it, as I have done. I was brought up in a Christian home. After I came to the city my business grew so rapidly that I drifted away from Church, and from the Bible and the family altar. I had a little daughter who was the idol of my life. She was at that time accustomed almost every evening to go to a neighbor's house. I reproved her two or three times, and at last whipped her for going. That night she was taken sick. And when she was flushed with the fever, she called me to her side and said: 'Papa, don't think I did wrong because I wished to go over to Mr. So and So's house. I went there for you. You used to have family prayers, but somehow you are too busy now to have them. And my little schoolmate's papa always has family prayers, and so I went over to pray for you and mamma.' Yes," said the old man, with tears streaming down his cheeks, "my little daughter had to tell that to me, who had once been rocked in a Christian cradle and reared in a Christian home. She had to tell that to me, a sinful man, when she herself was about to take the long journey over the river of death, from which no traveler ever returns." If you, O sinful man, fight against the religious influences of your past life, you, like the aged, broken-hearted parent, will live to regret it. When God holds high his balances he is going to weigh us in reference to our religious opportunities, as he did when he weighed the sinful life of Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans.

God's balances weigh every individual life, irrespective of the conduct of other people. It was no availing excuse for Belshazzar to say that he ought not to be weighed in God's balances and found wanting, while there were a thousand other drunken lords of the Babylonish capital, intoxicated in the royal banquet hall. It was no legitimate excuse for the Eastern ruler to raise, that his immoral, infamous ways, did not call for more severe condemnation than those of hundreds of eastern royal aristocrats who were loathsome with the same cancerous sins. And yet there are thousands of flagrant sinners to-day, who foolishly think that God will overlook and pardon their evil practices, merely because they are no worse than their next-door neighbors; no worse than the people with whom they come in daily contact. They act as if they expected a universal pardon for unrepentant sin, in spite of the fact that the Bible directly and emphatically declares: "Every man shall die for his own sin." Human justice makes example of conspicuous criminals like John Wilkes Booth, Guiteau, Czolgosz and the assassin of President Carnot, each of them perishing for his own crime, not for the crimes of others, just as you must perish, if you die impenitent, for the sins you have individually committed, regardless of what others have done.

False Security

God's balances weigh every individual at the times when he feels independent of God, as well as when he feels dependent upon the divine mercy. Never in all his life did Belshazzar consider himself more independent of his enemies than on the occasion of this sinful feast. The capital of Babylon was stocked with provisions enough to supply the city for many years. The battering rams of the besieging army had made no impression at all upon the bronzed gates. The walls were too high to scale. For two long years the Persian hosts had been conducting a futile siege. But history tells that on the night of this famous feast, while the king and his princes and a thousand aristocratic lords of his kingdom were drinking themselves drunk, Cyrus, seeing his opportunity, turned aside the course of the River Euphrates, and in the early hours of the morning marched along that river bed, under the great bronze gates and along the great boulevards, until at last his soldiers, with drawn swords, broke into that banquet hall and changed the wassail of wine into a carnival of blood. So, my brother, at the very time when you feel you are most secure and can sin with the greatest safety, God is watching your secret sin and he is decreeing that you must die. O, man of sinful habit, hearing to-night of Belshazzar's banquet hall, do you not feel that you can never escape the scrutiny of God's all-seeing eye, never be independent of his inexorable scales?

While we live, God's balances are never put away; his all-seeing eye is never shut. Just before the battle of Sor, Frederick the Great gave an emphatic order that every light should be put out, and that no soldier should even have a candle lighted in his tent. That night, the great Prussian general, as was his custom, went prowling around his camps to verify with his own eyes whether his orders were obeyed. Seeing a light in a soldier's tent, he crept up and looked in. There he saw a soldier with a lighted candle, hidden beneath his knapsack, writing a letter. All that Frederick the Great said, was this: "Young man, add a postscript to that letter which you have just written. Say, 'Good-bye, forever. I have disobeyed my king's commands in order to write this letter, and by the order of King Frederick I shall be shot to-morrow.'" As Frederick the Great always kept his eye on his troops, God's all-seeing eye is always watching us, even in the most secret of places. He watches us in the most sacred places of our chambers, in the office, when we go down the street, wherever we may be. No sin is a secret sin to God. He knows all and sees all. The same divine scales that weighed the sinful life of Belshazzar in the banquet hall of the Babylonish capital are continually weighing us, no matter where we may be.

The Weight of the Cross

But though God's balances may be condemning scales for the Belshazzars of sin, they may also become scales of salvation for every immortal soul, that avails itself of Christ's atonement. It is not now a question of how many sins may be piled into the right scale, but rather of whether we are willing to place the atoning Cross in the left. Though the sins of God's wayward children may be mountains high and seas deep, yet that Cross is able to outweigh them all. In the Philadelphia mint can be seen a pair of scales so perfectly adjusted that if a speck of dirt falls into one of the scales, or a fly walks across the balancing bar overhanging it, that scale will sink. God's scales are perfectly adjusted spiritually. No matter how many or how great our sins may be, if we once place the Cross of Jesus Christ into the scale, opposite to that which is piled high with our sins, we shall then be weighed in the balances and not found wanting.

All-Embracing Atonement

What a blessed and transporting thought this should be, that we can have all our sins outweighed! We would not dare for one instant to preach a sermon upon God's balances at Belshazzar's feast, unless we could place the greatest emphasis upon this idea. It would be appalling to depict the horror of a sinner's eternity, unless at the same time we could offer a pardon for all sins to all people if they would only be willing to be cleansed of their sins in the blood of the Lamb. I once read of a dramatic scene, where there was not enough physical salvation to go around. It was on the deck of the United States man-of-war Trenton, during the famous cyclone in the Samoan harbor a few years ago. Every officer and sailor had divested himself of all his outer garments, because every moment they expected the huge ship to go down, as many of the other vessels had already been engulfed before their eyes. But though every man was making all the necessary preparations he could, for what seemed the inevitable plunge, there was one life preserver for which no one seemed to have any particular use. It was the only life preserver on board, and nobody wanted to take it and live and let his companions die. A sailor handed it up to the executive officer. The executive officer would not put it on, but handed it to the captain. The captain in turn handed it to the admiral. The admiral refusing to put it on, this life preserver was carelessly thrown across the rail of the bridge. "There it hung," said an eye-witness, "a glowing tribute to the courage of men who were unwilling to be saved, if they knew thereby that their companions had to die." But though there may not be physical salvation enough to go around the whole crew of a doomed ship, yet, thank God, there is spiritual salvation enough for all the world if we only will accept that salvation through the blood of Jesus Christ. There is no need of any Belshazzar of sin to-day being found wanting when he is weighed in God's balances if he will only let the Cross of Jesus Christ be placed in the scale opposite to that which is piled high with his past sins.

The entrance into Belshazzar's banquet hall of sin is not one of unalloyed joy. The poet tried to describe the wild exultation of that feast, when he imaginatively wrote these words:

Oh, ne'er in Babylon did blaze a sight
More richly grand, magnificently bright;
Bearing his crown, and dressed in robe of state,
High on his throne of gold Belshazzar sate;
In shining robes and stretching far away,
Like billows quivering 'neath the sunset ray,
Chiefs, nobles, stood, the red lamps floating o'er
The golden chains and purple robes they wore.

But in all that vast throng there was many a sad heart, many a hopeless despair. To me, Belshazzar's feast is better described by the artist by whom I saw it pictured at Buffalo, N. Y., in the World's Fair of 1901. Ushered into a dark room, we sat there a while in total darkness. Then, by the magical effects of lights, it slowly became brighter and brighter, until, upon the side of the wall, we could see dim figures begin to form themselves. They looked at first like hideous phantoms. Then, as it became lighter and lighter, until the whole room glowed with light, we saw the inside of a huge palace. There were the broad stairs leading upward. There were the bodies of men and women lying prostrate upon the floor, amid overturned tables, and spilled decanters, and broken furniture. It was but also a shocking scene of filthy bestialities. In the centre of the staircase stood the horrified king, with strained eyes looking at the letters of fire burning themselves into the wall, while off in the distance could be seen the Persian soldiers with drawn swords, ready to dilute the spilt wine with human gore, and to change the floor into a reservoir of blood. Then the lights of the room began to dim, and it grew darker and darker, and blacker and blacker, until at last it seemed as though we were incarcerated in the dungeons of the eternally lost and the destroyed. So, when the would-be sinner would enter the banquet hall of sin, he always goes there at first like one groping about in the darkness, as fearing that he may be walking upon the edge of a precipice. He enters with horror and trembling, in terror and with tears. Then, in the midnight hour of the carnival, the banqueter in the hall of sin sees that fatal handwriting upon the wall. You, oh sinner, to-day see it. You see it with horrified eyes, as Belshazzar saw it.

A Solemn Warning

You see it written by the dead fingers of those who have lifted the same cup of death to their lips that you are lifting at the present time. Then, as in the room where I saw the picture at the World's Fair, you feel that it begins to grow darker and darker. The light in the reveller's eyes can no longer keep your courage up. Already in that darkness you can see the advancing messengers of God's vengeance. It is horror at the opening of the banquet, it is horror in the middle of the banquet, it will be unutterable horror at its close, when God shall finally say to you, oh sinner, "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting."

So, in closing, as I plead with you to flee from the banquet-hall of sin, I again invite you into the other banquet hall, where Christ the Divine Bridegroom is to be married to the Church, his Bride. I would invite you into that banquet hall, which is filled with the great multitudes of the Redeemed. I would earnestly invite you to come, because there is a vacant place at that Gospel banquet table, which I am sure has been reserved for you. It is in the centre of a group of your loved ones. It is right next to your sainted mother and father, and wife and sister and child. And by the looks of your loved ones, I think they are waiting for you. Oh sinner, are you ready to-day to leave the revellers of sin and to quaff the Water of Life, which will fit you for entrance among the sainted hosts? Or shall you, as a result of this spurned Gospel invitation, be weighed in the balances and forever found wanting? God is even now holding high the balances. May every one of us, by the power of the Holy Spirit, decide how the balances of God shall be moved. May we decide that the scale of sin, through the weight of the Cross, shall go up, and not go down.

World is Queer"

QUAINT PSALMS FOR QUEER FOLK

...By...
Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM IX.

The Psalm of Destiny

16. The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth; the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands. Higgaion. Selah.

THE TWO WAYS

17. The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God.

This Psalm brings us to the "gates of death," and we learn where the wicked will go.

We learn, too, that when God makes inquisition for blood he will not forget the humble.

They who flee unto God for refuge, and it; they who turn from God and against him, will be caught in the snare of their own hands.

No sinner need be lost, but some will by their own choice and way.

PSALM X.

The Saloon-keeper's Psalm

7. His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud: under his tongue is mischief and vanity.

8. He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor.

9. He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net.

10. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall.

Had the Psalmist lived in our day, and written of the liquor-seller and his saloon, he could have given no truer picture than is here painted, of the man who for gain and gold, will shuffle and bow and please—all to the secret murder of the innocent, and catching of the poor in his net.

A drunkard's hell must be awful, but the man who sent him there will find a hotter place, I think

The Day of Reckoning will come, and drunkard-makers will face both Judge and judgment.

"DRAW WITH HIM INTO HIS NET"

PSALM XI.

The Foundation Psalm

3. If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?

"THE STRONG FOUNDATION"

4. The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men.

All characters and kingdoms must be built on Truth, if they are to stand.

It is an eternal truth that a difference exists between right and wrong; between righteousness and wickedness; between good and bad, and the difference is eternal, too.

Hearken! "Upon the wicked He shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest. This shall be the portion of their cup." What a protest against the false universalism of this present hour!

PSALM XII.

The Backslider's Psalm

1. Help, Lord; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men.

HIS BACK TO THE CHURCH

2. They speak vanity every one with his neighbor: with flattering lips and with a double heart do they speak.

When "the godly man ceaseth and the faithful fail," it is quite time to cry, as in this Psalm, "Help, Lord!"

When flattery is abroad and double speaking is done, and vile men are exalted, no wonder the wicked walk on every side.

Oh for a revival of power, that will make men faithful to their vows; that will order lip and life alike obedient to the Commandments! Then will oppression of the poor cease and the sighing of the needy stop.

The "Children's Hour"

THE "Children's Hour," Friday afternoons, at Washington Square M. E. Church, is, to describe it in the language of the little folks, "one of the happiest hours that ever was." At the first meeting of the season, October 3, small people trooping from every direction—some with school-books under their arms—crowded the church steps, asking for enrollment cards. Genial-looking ladies, wearing blue badges, constituted the Reception Committee. Every boy and girl was given a button, with a picture of a lion's head on it. Over the platform, a tufted lion's head and pictures of lions were disposed on a red background. A large and fine engraving of "Daniel in the Lions' Den" was hung in conspicuous position; the hymn for the meeting was "Dare to be a Daniel," and Rev. Dr.

Reed's talk to the children was on "Lions." General George Wingate, of the Board of Education, presided. There were several addresses, and a bell-ringer played tunes on a bell. The auditorium was crowded. The average attendance at these meetings is about six hundred, the children themselves, in songs and recitations, furnish part of each entertainment. But the cream of each "Hour" is the pastor's object-lesson talk. Dr. Reed has made a great success of this "Children's Hour," and his plan might be effectively followed elsewhere. The meetings are undenominational, children of all creeds coming. The souvenirs given at the first meeting were CHRISTIAN HERALDS, which the children seemed to appreciate very much. The Principals of the public schools in that neighborhood and the District Superintendent serve as presiding officers at the "Children's Hour," and lend it cordial support, as they say it is doing great good in that section of the city.

A Drought and Famine in the Canaries

The islands of Puertaventura and Lanzarote of the Canary Isles, are suffering want, from the effect of a two and a half-year's drought. There is extreme distress among all classes there. There is a lack of irrigation work and of wells. Water flows under the surface in many parts of the islands. The native poor have lost their cattle, their vines, and their crops for three years in succession. Many have been driven to emigrate to Canary and Tenerife. The people of the Canaries feed and clothe them, and minister to them the Word of Life. Missionary T. M. Macknight, of Laguna, Tenerife Island, is endeavoring to succor these people, and will welcome any and all that may come to assist him in the work.

The First English Colony

ALL that remains of the first English colony planted by Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1584, on Roanoke Island, are the traces of the old fort built by the colonists and now owned by one of the North Carolina historical societies, whose members have erected four granite posts at the different angles, says a writer in the Washington Post, so that visitors may discern its outlines in the thick grass and live oak timber. It was on this little island that the first English colony set foot. Here it was that the first English colonists inaugurated the era of Anglo-Saxon colonization; here where they built their dwellings, sowed their crops, and performed their religious devotions. Upon the soil of Roanoke landed the first English women who crossed the ocean to find homes in the newly discovered world beyond the seas, and here also was born the first English child who saw the light of the New World.

Arbitration in the Strike

WITH a feeling of profound relief, the whole country will welcome the news that there is, at last, a reasonable prospect of the settlement of the coal strike by arbitration. After a period of hesitation, President Roosevelt's proposition to refer the whole question to a commission of arbitrators has been practically accepted. It was the only sensible way out of the difficulty. Assuming that the commission will be a fair, unbiased body of men, who will judge the case upon its merits, according a full hearing and just consideration to both sides in the controversy, there is no reason to apprehend that the decision to be rendered will be other than equitable. This is all that either the operators or the miners could ask or expect. The tribunal will establish an excellent precedent, as illustrating in the highest degree the principle to be applied in similar troubles hereafter.

To the friends of arbitration everywhere—and we are happy to believe that they are steadily growing in numbers—it will be especially gratifying, as a distinguished recognition of the principle for which they have so loyally contended. From the beginning of the troubles, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has advocated arbitration. It has stood practically alone in this advocacy, though now the press is unanimously on its side. It urged its adoption, at a time when miners and coal magnates were alike loud in their protestations that arbitration was impossible—one side even bluntly asserting that "there was nothing that could be arbitrated." Then there came a time when the extraordinary spectacle was presented of a whole country suffering, schools and hospitals closing, and many lines of trade stagnating, while the furious quarrel went on. Warned by the reiterated advice of the President, and sensible of the fact that things were rapidly approaching a condition that would not be tolerated, both sides have yielded to calmer counsels. Already the tension is relieved, although weeks must pass before normal conditions can be restored.

Let us hope that the lesson of the strike will not be lost. Arbitration at the outset would have saved over a hundred millions of dollars to the operators and miners, averted widespread inconvenience and suffering, and preserved at least the semblance of amicable relations, where the bitterest feeling has prevailed. We are now told that it has been discovered that existing laws are adequate for dealing with conditions similar to those that have prevailed in Pennsylvania. This, however, will not satisfy the American people. What is needed—and needed urgently—is the enactment of a law by Congress, providing for compulsory arbitration, and establishing a proper tribunal for all labor disputes in which more than a single State is involved or affected. It should be the duty of Congress, at the coming session, to pass such a law at the earliest opportunity. The time is ripe for such a measure, and it would be hailed as a substantial step forward in our progressive civilization.

A Course of Home Study

ALL over this country there are thousands of people who have never had the advantage of a good education, that is to say, an elementary education, fitting them to face the world as intelligent citizens. Among these there are few who do not feel the desire to overcome this drawback to their advancement and happiness.

Self-education, however, appears to be a very formidable task. And so it is for those who wish to join the ranks of the intellectual. But of many, indeed of most among us, it is not required to be intellectual. We are practical people, living workaday lives, and it is sufficient for us to be intelligent. Men who are most highly educated during those early years of their life devoted to instruction, do not, probably in the majority of cases, find that academic knowledge assists them to any great extent in solving the practical problems of life. Starting out, therefore, with no greater ambition than to make yourself a useful and intelligent factor in the social community, self-education no longer seems so formidable as it at first appeared. How to set about it, becomes the next problem. To assist those who are anxious to undertake this duty of self-education, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has invited a number of practical educators to outline a series of courses for home study—some very elementary and others more advanced—which will afford practical advice as to the studies that should be pursued, and also as to the text-books which should be mastered. These courses are not intended to take the place of a college education. Their sole purpose is to afford a chance to those whose early education has, for any reason, been neglected, to improve their condition, and to bring them up to the point where they shall be able, intelligently, to decide what further studies they would like to pursue—in other words, to acquire a practical elementary education. The first of the series, by Edgar Vanderbilt, Principal of Public School, No. 55, New York City, appears on page 895 in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Although a regular plan of study is outlined, the general suggestions will be found equally valuable for those whose only opportunity for education is in availing themselves of odd moments.

A system for the best use of odd moments is important. It is necessary to find out what books you wish to study; then get the books, and keep them where you can lay hands on them at a moment's notice. It may be there is room for one of them always in your pocket. In the hours spent in traveling to and from a place of business there is time for many people to educate themselves. "Some people," says Mr. Mabie, "in deciding what books they will read, and in finding the books, waste enough time to read the books through and through." We give two watchwords to every home student—System, Thoroughness.

General Booth's Visit

THE welcome extended to General Booth, on his arrival in New York, was not only a tribute to his personality, but a testimony to the value of the work of the organization of which he is the head. Our distinguished visitor could read in the enthusiastic greeting to him how highly the American people appreciate the service of the Salvation Army. They have witnessed the devotion and the earnestness of its members; they have admired their moral courage and their Christlike efforts to rescue the lost and depraved, and can bear witness to the success with which God has owned and blessed their work. It was proper, therefore, that the consecrated man who has been its leader and director, should be received with marks of public gratitude. There is no man who deserves such gratitude so thoroughly as one whose followers are engaged in "turning many to righteousness."

The cordiality of General Booth's reception is peculiarly gratifying to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, because it was the first journal to welcome the pioneer detachment of the Salvation Army when it landed on our shores, twenty-two years ago. Commissioner Railton and his little company came to the office of this journal on the day of their arrival, to take counsel about the beginning of their campaign. This journal stood loyally by them in the early days of storm and stress, and heartily commended them to the good will of the Christian public; it has, therefore, a right to rejoice with them, as they contemplate the victories God has wrought through their efforts. They have been truly wonderful. To one who saw that little band of humble workers in those early days, and now sees the vast numbers included in the ranks of the Army and hears of the extent and variety of their labors, the contrast is very impressive. It shows how mighty a power is that of the Holy Spirit, that with means apparently so inadequate could have achieved such conquests.

As will be seen from the interview with General Booth, printed on another page, there is no relaxation in the energies either of the Army or of its venerable leader. The ground already occupied is regarded as only the vantage ground for still more vigorous effort. Under the able leadership of Commander Booth-Tucker the American branch of the Army is never likely to rest upon its laurels, but will continue its glorious warfare without cessation. This visit of his venerable chief, like the presence of the commander of an army on the field of battle, will doubtless cheer and encourage him and inspire all to still more valiant service than ever.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Glorious Transition

—OUR TROUBLES in this world are preparative for glory. What a transition it was for Paul—from the slippery deck of a foundering ship to the calm presence of Jesus! What a transition it was for Latimer—from the stake to a throne! What a transition it was for Robert Hall—from insanity to glory! What a transition it was for Richard Baxter—from the dropsy to the "Saint's Everlasting Rest"! And what a transition it will be for you—from a world of sorrow to a world of joy! John Holland, when he was dying, said, "What means this brightness in the room? Have you lighted the candles?" "No," they replied, "we have not lighted any candles." Then said he, "Welcome heaven!" The light already beaming upon his pillow. O ye who are persecuted in this world, your enemies will get off the track after a while, and all will speak well of you among the thrones. O ye who are sick now. No medicines to take there. One breath of the immortal hills will thrill you with immortal vigor. And ye who are lonesome now. There will be a million spirits to welcome you into their companionship. O ye bereft souls! there will be no gravedigger's spade that will cleave the side of that hill, and there will be no dirge wailing from that temple. The river of God, deep as the joy of heaven, will roll on between banks odoriferous with balm, and over depths bright with jewels, and under skies roseate with gladness, argosies of light going down the stream to the stroke of glittering oar and the song of angels! Not a sigh in the wind; not a tear mingling with the waters.

God's Axes

—GOD PUTS a soul into the furnace of trial, and then it is brought out and run through the crushing machine, and then it comes down on the anvil and upon it, blow after blow, blow after blow, until the soul cries out: "O Lord, what does all this mean?" God says: "I want to make something very useful out of you, you shall be something to hew with and something to build with. It is a practical process through which I am putting you." Yes, my Christian friends, we want more tools in the church of God; not more wedges to split with. We have enough of these. Not more bores with which to drill. We have too many bores. What we really want is keen, sharp, well-tempered axes, and if there be any other way of making them than in the hot furnace and on the hard anvil and under the heavy hammer, I do not know what it is. Remember that if God brings any kind of chastisement upon you, it is only to make you useful. Do not sit down discouraged and say: "I have no more reason for living. I wish I were dead." Oh, there never was so much reason for your living as now! By this ordeal you have been consecrated a priest of the most high God. Go out and do your whole work for the Master.

Home Influence

—TRAVELER FOR ETERNITY, your little ones gathered under your robes, are you leading them on the right road, or are you taking them out on the dangerous winding bridle-path off which their inexperienced feet may slip, and up which comes the howling of the wolf and the sound of loosened ledge and tumbling avalanche? Blessed is the family altar in which the Christian mother rocks the Christian child. Blessed is the song the little ones sing at nightfall when sleep is closing the eyes and loosening the hand from the toy on the pillow. Blessed is that mother whose every heart-throb is a prayer for her children's welfare. The world grows old and the stars will cease to illuminate it and the waters to refresh it and the mountains to guard it and the heavens to overspan it and its long story of sin and shame and glory and triumph will soon turn to ashes; but influences that started in the early home roll on and roll up through all eternity—blooming in all the joy, waving in all the triumph, exulting in all the sun, or shrinking back into all the darkness. Father, mother, which way are you leading your children?

The Eternal Home

—HEAVEN to many of us is a great fog. It is away off somewhere, filled with an uncertain and indefinite population. That is the kind of heaven that many of us dream about; but it is the most tremendous fact in all this universe—this heaven of the Gospel. Our departed friends are not afloat. The residence in which you live is not so real as the residence in which they stay. You are afloat—you who do not know in the morning what will happen before night. They are housed and safe forever. Do not, therefore, pity your departed friends who have died in Christ. They do not need your pity. Do not say of those who are departed: "Poor child!" "Poor father!" "Poor mother!" They are not poor. You are poor—you whose homes have been shattered, not they.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Isthmian Canal

LEGAL obstacles to the purchase of the Panama Canal, which at one period seemed to threaten the collapse of the purchase, appear now to have been surmounted. According to the report of the counsel of the Panama Company, a perfect title has been placed in the hands of the Attorney-General, showing that the new company has an indubitable right to dispose of the works, the privileges and concessions vested in the old company. A test case was submitted to the French Court by a bondholder of the old company, challenging the right of the new company to effect a sale to the United States. The Court decided against him, and the decision has now been confirmed by the higher Court. It would appear from this, that the French holders have fulfilled their promise, and that we may construct the canal without fear of having to pay the claims of French creditors. On the other hand, the difficulties in this hemisphere have increased. The civil war in Colombia continues, with no apparent prospect of settlement. It is no secret that if the insurgents should be successful, they would probably repudiate the concession granted to M. de Lesseps, compelling us to sue for a new concession, which might seriously increase the initial cost of the canal. It is alleged that this threat, and also the threat to damage the existing works, have been instigated by Nicaragua, with the object of forcing us to choose the Nicaraguan route. The decisive steps taken by our Government to protect the Panama railroad may, however, convince the insurgents that we should be similarly able and ready to protect the canal if we finally decide to proceed by that route. There is now no doubt that the canal will be constructed by one route or the other, and as the Panama route is shorter and will be less costly to operate, it is probable that it will be preferred, unless unexpected international difficulties arise. It is marvelous that so narrow an obstruction should have so long barred the way of commerce, but the time is now near at hand when it will do so no longer. Men of this age, more than those of any former period of the world's history, are availing themselves of God's commission:

Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet; the fowl of the air and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas (Ps. 8: 6, 8).

The Tables Turned

Saloon-keepers in a Connecticut town have had the tables turned upon them in an amusing manner by the citizens. It has been the custom for many years for the proprietors of the barrooms of the town to present their regular customers at Christmas with some token of their appreciation of patronage. The presents ranged from a few cigars to a bottle of wine or spirits, according to the sum the customer spent at the bar during the year. Last year, however, they decided to discontinue the practice. Customers went as usual to their respective saloons, expecting to receive the customary gratuity. To their astonishment they read on the mirror behind the bar the announcement, "No Christmas Presents; don't ask for any." Many of the patrons of the saloons were so disgusted that since that time they have been more ready than before to listen to temperance workers. Last week, when the question of license or no license was submitted to the popular vote, a number of workers, wearing buttons inscribed, "No License; don't ask for any," were busy getting the discontented to vote against license. The result was, that when the votes were counted it was found that a majority of the voters had voted against license. There will, consequently, be no liquor openly sold in the town during the ensuing year. It is a good thing that the liquor is to be excluded for one year. There would be more hope of a permanent reform if the drinkers had voted no license from principle not from pique; but perhaps after a year's experience they may cast the same vote with a higher motive. They will do well to heed the admonition Paul addressed to his converts:

Stand fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage (Gal. 5: 1).

To Arbitrate the Coal Strike

At last, the long strike of the miners in the anthracite coal region is to be settled by arbitration. It is understood that President Roosevelt appealed to Mr. J. P. Morgan, to use his influence with the employers to bring about a settlement.

THE SHIP CANAL AT SAULT STE. MARIE, THE MODEL OF THAT PROJECTED AT PANAMA

The result was a proposal on their part to submit the questions in dispute to a commission to be named by the President. The employers stipulated that the commission should consist of five men, each of whom should respectively possess some special qualification for arriving at an equitable decision. One was to be an officer of the Army; another a mining engineer; a third a judge of the United States Courts; a fourth a sociologist; and the fifth, a man who had experience in mining and selling coal. The miners, while welcoming the concession, pointed out that they were not represented on the tribunal, and eventually the employers consented to the addition of a sixth member who, though not to be a miner, should be in sympathy with the miners. Thus restricted in his choice, the President has named General John M. Wilson; Mr. Edward W. Parker, editor of The Engineering and Mining Journal; Judge George Gray, of Delaware; Mr. E. E. Clark, Grand Chief of Railway Conductors; Mr. Thomas H. Watkins, of Scranton, Pa., and Bishop John L. Spalding, of Peoria, Ill. The Hon. Carroll D. Wright will be Recorder of the Commission. A convention of miners was promptly called to consider the proposal, but the opinion is general that it will be accepted, and that the men will return to work. The employers would have saved themselves a heavy loss and have saved the miners and the public much suffering if they had consented to this method of settling the strike three months ago. The whole world, which now looks to this country as an example, must have felt as they read of the protracted strike much as the Apostle felt when he heard of the disputes in the Church:

Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? No, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren (1. Cor. 6: 5).

A $20,000 Operation

The largest fee probably ever paid for a single surgical operation, is that which was received by Prof. Adolf Lorenz, of Vienna, a few days ago, from Mr. J. Ogden Armour, of Chicago. Mr. Armour's little daughter, Lolita, has suffered since her birth from congenital dislocation of the hip. As all means of reducing the dislocation had failed, Mr. Armour induced Professor Lorenz to journey from the Austrian capital to this country to operate upon her. The professor is known as the most skilful orthopedist in so changing their natures that they shall walk in the way of holiness.

I will give them a heart of flesh, that they may walk in my statutes (Ezek. 11: 19).

The Navajos Not Starving

A statement, recently published in a western paper, claiming that the Navajo Indians were on the verge of starvation, obtained wide publicity. A number of letters were received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from sympathetic persons in different States, urging that this journal should take some measures for the relief of the Navajos. The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, desiring accurate information, wrote to the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. E. A. Hitchcock, making the necessary inquiries. That official referred the letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for investigation. A few days ago, a letter was received from Secretary Hitchcock, enclosing a communication of Indian Commissioner Jones, in which the latter states that, in response to an appeal by Senator Rawlins of Utah, in August last, in behalf of 6,000 Navajo Indians in that State, the Department, on August 26, authorized the expenditure of $3,000 for food supplies. This authorization was telegraphed to the Agent at Navajo Agency, N. M. That official promptly wired that there was no such suffering as the report indicated. Meanwhile other petitions in behalf of the Navajos were received, and $10,000 was appropriated to employ needy Navajos at $1 per day in constructing irrigation ditches. Shortly afterward, on September 18, the Navajo agent made another report, stating that he had made a full investigation, personally, of the condition of the tribe. The Navajos called a council, and informed him they had plenty to eat and were happy and contented. They declined the offer to employ 100 of them at $1 per day. The reports of starvation and suffering were, doubtless, circulated by persons who expected to be personally benefited by having the government expend a considerable sum of money among these Indians. Secretary Hitchcock concludes, from the whole correspondence, that there has been no suffering among the Navajos, and that, on the contrary, they are well supplied, happy and satisfied. This effectually disposes of the stories of starvation that have been so freely circulated. It is due to the State Department and to the Indian Bureau, that the result of their investigation should be as widely known as possible, that the sensational reports may be corrected. It is a wicked thing to trade on the generosity of the public by false or exaggerated statements of distress, and it does far-reaching mischief, by making people suspicious in other cases where there is real and urgent need. People who thus check charitable impulses deserve the apostolic condemnation:

By reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of; and through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you, whose judgment now a long time lingereth not and their destruction slumbereth not (II. Peter 2: 3).

BRIEF NOTES

Hon. M. Patterson, Canadian Minister of Customs, has issued an order prohibiting the landing of excursion parties on Sunday at the lake towns.

Mr. John Kensit, the disturber of the peace of ritualists and high churchmen in England, is dead. His son, who is in prison for creating a disturbance in a church, was allowed to visit his father before his death.

The Twentieth Century National Gospel Campaign Committee has arranged with Mr. Charles Inglis, the noted English evangelist, to make an extended tour in this country. Pastors desiring to avail themselves of his services may address Mr. Wm. Phillips Hall, 113 Fulton street, New York.

BARRIERS IN THE YOUNG MAN'S PATH

Dr. Orison S. Marden Points Out the Principal Causes of Failure in Life—How Promising Careers are Shipwrecked

SINCE humble birth, and handicaps of every sort and degree have not prevented success; since want has often spurred to needed action and obstacles but train to higher leaping, why should men fail? What causes the failures and half-successes that make up the generality of mankind?

O. S. MARDEN

The answer is manifold, but its lesson is plain. As one writer has expressed it, "Every mainspring of success is a mainspring of failure, when wound around the wrong way." Every opportunity for advancement, for climbing, for success, is just as much an opportunity for failure. Every success quality can be turned to one's disadvantage through excessive development or wrong use. The finest tools can mar a statue in a burglar's hands. No matter how broad and strong the dike may be, if a little hole lets the water through, ruin and disaster are sure. Possession of almost all the success-qualities may be absolutely nullified by one or two faults or vices. Sometimes one or two masterful traits of character will carry a person to success in spite of defects that are a serious clog.

The numerous failures who wish always to blame their misfortunes upon others, or upon external circumstances, find small comfort in statistics compiled by those who have investigated the subject. In analyzing the causes of business failure in 1901, Bradstreet's found that seven-tenths were due to faults of those failing, and only three-tenths to causes entirely beyond their control. Faults causing failure, with per cent. of failures caused by each, are given as follows: Incompetence, 19 per cent.; inexperience, 7.8 per cent.; lack of capital, 30.3 per cent.; unwise granting of credit, 3.6 per cent.; speculation, 2.3 per cent. It may be explained that "lack of capital" really means attempting to do too much with inadequate capital. This is a purely commercial analysis of purely commercial success. Character delinquencies must be read between the lines. Real failure and real success are much broader, and include many more causes of failure. In fact, the forty successful men questioned by Rev. Charles Townsend assigned many more causes. In response to the question, "What, in your observation, are the chief causes of the failure in life of business or professional men, barring, of course, periods of national financial depression?" these men mentioned the following:

Bad habits; bad judgment; bad luck; bad associates; carelessness of details; constant assuming of unjustifiable risks; desire to become rich too fast; drinking; dishonest dealings; dislike of retrenchment; dislike to say no at the proper time; disregard of the Golden Rule; drifting with the tide; expensive habits of life; extravagance; envy; failure to appreciate one's surroundings; failure to grasp one's opportunities; frequent changes from one business to another; fooling away of time in pursuit of a so-called good time; gambling; inattention; incompetent assistants; incompetency; indolence; jealousy. Lack of attention to business; of application; of adaptation; of ambition; of business methods; of capital; of conservatism; of close attention to business; of confidence in self; of careful accounting; of careful observation; of definite purpose; of discipline in early life; of discernment of character; of enterprise; of energy; of economy; of faithfulness; of faith in one's calling; of industry; of integrity; of judgment; of knowledge of business requirements; of manly character; of natural ability; of perseverance; of pure principles; of proper courtesy toward people; of purpose; of pluck; of promptness in meeting business engagements; of system. Late hours; living beyond one's income; leaving too much to one's employees; neglect of details; no inborn love for one's calling; over-confidence in the stability of existing conditions; procrastination; speculative mania; Sabbath-breaking; selfishness; self-indulgence in small vices; studying ease rather than vigilance; social demoralization; thoughtless marriages; trusting your own work to others; undesirable location; unwillingness to pay the price of success; unwillingness to bear early privations; waste; yielding too easily to discouragement.

Surely, here is material enough for a hundred sermons if one cared to preach them. Without attempting to discuss all these causes of failure, some few may be profitably examined.

No youth can hope to succeed who is timid, who lacks faith in himself, who has not the courage of his convictions, and who always seeks for certainty before he ventures. "Self-distrust is the cause of most of our failures," said Bovee. "In the assurance of strength there is strength, and they are the weakest, however strong, who have no faith in themselves or their powers."

"The ruin which overtakes so many merchants," said Whipple, "is due, not so much to their lack of business talent, as to their lack of business nerve. How many lovable persons we see in trade, endowed with brilliant capacities, but cursed with yielding dispositions—who are resolute in no business habits and fixed in no business principles—who are prone to follow the instincts of a weak good nature, against the ominous hints of a clear intelligence; now obliging this friend by indorsing an unsafe note, and then pleasing that neighbor by sharing his risk in a hopeless speculation, and who, after all the capital they have earned by their industry and sagacity has been sunk in benevolent attempts to assist blundering or plundering incapacity, are doomed, in their bankruptcy, to be the mark of bitter taunts from growling creditors and insolent pity from a gossiping public."

One thing that keeps young men down is their fear of work. They aim to find genteel occupations, so they can dress well, and not soil their clothes, and handle things with the tips of their fingers. They do not like to get their shoulders under the wheel, and they prefer to give orders to others, or figure as masters, and let someone else do the drudgery. There is no place in this century for the lazy man. He will be pushed to the wall. Labor ever will be the inevitable price for everything that is valuable.

"A somewhat varied experience of men has led me, the longer I live," said Huxley, "to set less value on mere cleverness; to attach more and more importance to industry and physical endurance. Indeed, I am much disposed to think that endurance is the most valuable quality of all; for industry, as the desire to work hard, does not come to much if a feeble frame is unable to respond to the desire. No life is wasted unless it ends in sloth, dishonesty, or cowardice. No success is worthy of the name unless it is won by honest industry and brave breasting of the waves of fortune."

"No abilities, however splendid," said A. T. Stewart, "can command success without intense labor and persevering application."

Goethe said that industry is nine-tenths of genius, and Franklin that diligence is the mother of good luck. A thousand other tongues and pens have lauded work. Idleness and shiftlessness may be set down as causing a large part of the failures of the world.

There is, however, a mistaken idea of what industry is, which Freeman Hunt thus sets forth:

There are some men whose failure to succeed in life is a problem to others, as well as to themselves. They are industrious, prudent and economical; yet after a long life of striving, old age finds them still poor. They complain of ill luck, they say fate is against them. But the real truth is that their projects miscarry, because they mistake mere activity for energy. Confounding two things essentially different, they suppose that if they are always busy, they must of necessity be advancing their fortunes; forgetting that labor misdirected is but a waste of activity.

Work carried to excess causes failures also, more often failures as men than as business machines, perhaps, but even business success is endangered by overwork that exhausts vitality and makes one incapable of steady, continued exertion and energy.

On every side we see persons who started out with good educations and great promise, but who have gradually "gone to seed." Their early ambition oozed out, their early ideals gradually dropped to lower standards. Ambition is a spring that sets the apparatus going. All the parts may be perfect, but the lack of a spring is a fatal defect. Without wish to rise, desire to accomplish and to attain, no life will succeed largely.

"Chief among the causes which bring positive failure or a disappointing portion of half success to thousands of honest strugglers is vacillation," said Thomas B. Bryan. "The young men who keep their eyes fixed on a definite goal, never yielding an inch till their efforts are attended with absolute success, are not as common types as we might wish. Indomitable will is a quality of character that the young men of to-day may well afford to consider and cultivate."

Scattering forces has killed many a man's success. Withdrawal of the best of yourself from the work to be done is sure to bring final disaster. Every particle of a man's energy, intellect, courage and enthusiasm is needed to win success in one line. Draw off part of the supply of any one or all of these, and there is danger that what is left will not suffice. A little inattention to one's business at a critical point is quite sufficient to cause shipwreck. The pilot who pays attention to a pretty passenger is not likely to bring his ship to port. Attractive side issues, great schemes and flattering promises of large rewards, too often lure the business or professional man from the safe path in which he may plod on to sure success. Many a man fails to become a great man, by splitting into several small ones, choosing to be a tolerable Jack-at-all-trades, rather than to be an unrivalled specialist. This division of ambition and energy is sometimes due to a temperamental fault that shows itself in another, and quite as fatal a way, and is regarded by Robert C. Ogden, of Wanamaker's New York Store, as lying at the root of all failure. He said: "Failure to achieve success in business, the falling short of great desires and high aims on the part of young men, is traceable to one primal cause—the lack of thoroughness. The world is overcrowded with me young and old, who remain stationary, filling minor positions, and drawing meagre salaries, simply because they have never thought it worth while to achieve mastery in the pursuits they have chosen to follow."

Lack of education has caused few failures; if a man has success-qualities in him, he will not lack such education as is absolutely necessary to his success. I will walk fifty miles to borrow a book, like Lincoln. I will hang by one arm to a street lamp, and hold a book with the other, like a certain Glasgow boy. I will study between anvil blows, like Elihu Burritt; will do some of the thousand things other noble strugglers have done to fight against circumstances that would deprive them of what they hunger for.

Many observers and experienced employers assign several causes for the failures that have come under their notice, but ever and always these causes lie within the man.

"The five conditions of failure," said H. H. Vreeland, president of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company of New York, "may be roughly classified thus: First, laziness, and particularly mental laziness; second, lack of faith in the efficiency of work; third, reliance on the saving grace of luck; fourth, lack of courage, initiative and persistence; fifth, the belief that the young man's job affects his standing, instead of the young man affecting the standing of his job."

Look where you will, ask of whom you will, and you will find that not circumstances, but personal qualities, defects and deficiencies, cause failures. This is strongly expressed by a wealthy manufacturer who said: "Nothing else influences a man's career in life so much as his disposition. He may have capacity, knowledge, social position, or money to back him at the start; but it is his disposition that will decide his place in the world at the end. Show me a man who is, according to popular prejudice, a victim of bad luck, and I will show you one who has some unfortunate, crooked twist of temperament that invites disaster. He is ill-tempered, or conceited or trifling, or lacks enthusiasm."

The personal factor determines the sum of life's accomplishment. Once this is firmly fixed in mind, what hope it gives! You can be what you will be, for nothing is more clearly taught by modern thought than the possibility of self-development. No matter if you lack certain natural gifts, certain necessary qualities. You can acquire them, build them up. Resolve that you will, and work steadily, and above all, think steadily to that end, and you can surely avoid failure. The degree of your success will depend on the power you have to form yourself, to change negative into positive qualities.

Remember this: No one but yourself can force you to fail in reaching the highest success—a noble life.

FIRE-WALKING

Modern Moloch-Worship in Tahiti

IN Tahiti, an interesting member of the Society Islands group in far Oceania, the natives have a curious pagan custom known as "Fire-walking," in which a number of disciples follow a priest "over red-hot stones without burning their feet," a custom which at once suggests a revival of the old Moloch worship mentioned in the Bible. S. P. Langley describing, in the National Geographic Magazine, his observations of this ceremony, says:

"A shallow pit is dug, about nine feet by twenty, by eighteen inches deep. This is filled with firewood and stones heaped on the wood. These are smooth, water-worn volcanic stones of varying shapes and sizes. Old Papa-Ita (the priest) says that a woman who lived there long ago and who died and became a devil (or goddess) is the one to whom he prays, and by whose mediation he passes unhurt through the fire. . . The firewood was scarcely sufficient for a good heating; the stones in the centre and beneath were, however, undoubtedly 'red-hot.' . . The aids began to turn the stones with long green poles which burned at the ends. The old priest, Papa-Ita, beat the near stones with a large bunch of Ti leaves three times, and then began to walk through the middle rather hurriedly, followed by two acolytes, who appeared to shun the hot central ridge, and walked along the sides. Then he walked back, followed by several; then back again with an increasing crowd, most of whom avoided the centre. The horny-footed natives did the best. One white boy could not stand the heat upon his bare feet and stopped. At this point, i.e., after the second passage forward and back, I had the hottest stone of the pile in the centre, on which the feet had certainly rested several times, hauled out and placed in the water bucket. It was larger than I had reckoned or desired. A trifle of the water was spilled by the plunge, and the rest boiled hard and continued to do so for about twelve minutes. It was a long stone; the lower part had been immersed in the central fire, and it was certainly much hotter than the average centre stones. During this time other persons walked over, the disciples still dodging the hot stones."

This is the second article of a series on "The Causes of Success and Failure," by Dr. O. S. Marden, written specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

In the Discouraged Days

THE morning had dawned fair enough, but somehow things had gone awry all day. Rob, who was to have gone to Langhorne with his father, was taken ill, and sister Anna was kept home from school to look after his comfort. Then Baby Mary had fallen down the back stairs, and while no bones were broken, yet the poor child was so scared from the shock that it took all grandma's time to pacify her. Ned rushed in from school at lunch-time and, in his bustling, haphazard way, knocked grandma's glasses from the side table and broke them into atoms. This, of itself, was a serious matter, since grandma could neither see to read or sew without them.

"I wonder what ails the day," said the mother, in a discouraged way. "It seems to be one of those days when, say or do what we may, nothing seems to go well. Even Rob, usually so unflinching, is hard to control, and it is almost impossible to keep in a good temper and maintain sweetness under such circumstances."

Grandma looked up sweetly, the dear old lady's silver hair and placid brow spoke of many conflicts which had left her unseared still.

"I have passed many such days, daughter, when all things about us seemed to work together for our discomfort; but the thing essential to a happy day is a mild, unruffled temper."

"That is the secret of your power over baby; when the child is troublesome and whining, you have more control over her than any other member of the family."

"It was not always so," said grandma, smiling at the remembrance. "I have come to the end of many unhappy hours, disturbed, defeated, discouraged. I questioned with my own heart whether it was really worth while trying, since I had done my best and had really seemed to fail. I could scarcely see through my tears as I fell on my knees in prayer. Then I lifted up my eyes and beheld the form of the Immortal One, whose presence gave me strength and confidence. I took for my motto those scriptural words, 'I can do all things through Christ.' Not in myself, mind; I had tried there and met with failure only. When we look to him in every trial and difficulty, work goes easy and all is well again."

"What a dear old saint grandma is," said Rob to Anna. "Here I have been lying and making life miserable for you all, because I have had a trifling disappointment to bear." "And I have not been kind, either," Anna answered; "I had no business to complain about being kept from school when I knew it could not be helped." "I'm sorry enough I broke grandma's glasses; but that don't mend them," said Ned. "If we oftener look up in the discouraged days, as grandma does," mother said, "our minds would not be ruffled, and we could run with patience the race that is set before us." SARA V. DU BOIS.

Mrs. Roosevelt's Housekeeping

Part of the duty of every lady of the White House is to see that its supplies of table linen and other napery, its silver and its china, are properly kept up, as befits the home of the chief executive of a mighty nation. It used to be said of Queen Victoria, that she personally knew every set of china in her palaces, and on occasions of ceremony, designed to order this or that style of dishes, sometimes conveying a subtle compliment to distinguished guests by her choice of table ware. Our queens, lifted to our foremost seat of honor, by the popular suffrages which elect their husbands, bear the burden of their lofty positions but four or but eight years, as may happen. While the President is holding cabinet meetings, and signing bills, and otherwise engineering the affairs of the nation, his wife, if she chooses, may do a great deal towards beautifying his official residence. Mrs. Hays, for example, ordered a splendid set of 1,500 pieces, painted by Theodore R. Davis, in designs of birds, flowers, fruits, fish, game, etc. Mrs. Cleveland added a splendid set of dinner china, with the coat of arms of Uncle Sam inside a deep red border. One would not expect White House china to be subject to the nicks and cracks and general breakage which goes to the hearts of plain Mrs. Jones, of Centerville, and Mrs. Brown, of Mountain View, but alas! hired help is the same everywhere, and even those who serve a President, jumble a lot of dishes into the basin at once, pour scalding water on brittle porcelain, and so contrive that dinner sets gradually vanish from the face of the earth.

The fact is, that women who expect to preserve their china intact must wash it themselves. But we cannot ask our presidents' wives to do this, though tradition avers that Dolly Madison did.

Mrs. Roosevelt has ordered a complete service of silver and china for the White House, and has re-stocked its linen closets. Every piece of linen, under her direction, is embroidered with the arms of the United States. A new fire and burglar proof safe has been bought for the guarding of the silver, and everything in the White House feels the tuning up of a thoroughly practical housekeeper's judicious hand.

Mrs. Roosevelt has introduced a crescent-shaped table for the entertainment of large companies at dinner, so that the President, occupying the middle seat upon the outer curve of the table, might face all his guests. The nation is growing very proud and fond of the sensible little woman in the White House, a woman who, as wife, mother, provident

This is a pretty scene. The little mother is feeding the fine little chap, who grasps at the spoon, man-fashion, wanting all he can get. She is very patient. Her mother knows that Madelon will take good care of little Fred and Nannette.

MAUD'S BIRTHDAY

LITTLE Maud is eight years old, Blue her eyes; her curls are gold. Like a babbling brook in spring Little Maud can chat and sing.

She's a sunbeam in a room, Scattering all its shade and gloom. Father calls her love and pet, Cannot her sweet ways forget.

Mother's darling child is she, Winsome maiden, blithe and free. Little Maudie, eight years old, Eyes of blue and curls of gold.

Rejoicing in Hope

"WHAT, Abigail, weeping! Cannot you find anything to rejoice in, dear?"

A low, tremulous voice answered, "Since George is gone, I cannot rejoice in anything."

"Yet God is good still, and has only removed him in his boundless wisdom. Dear Abigail, cannot you see it is the Father's pitying hand that smites, and that those whom he loves he chasteneth still."

"But this separation; this cruel, bitter separation."

"Is only a short period, at most, and cannot you abide God's time? Just now, when I came by the nursery door, I heard little Fannie sobbing. 'What is it, dear?' I asked. 'I think God must be dead, auntie,' she said, 'mamma is so very sad.'"

Abigail's face flushed. "My great grief has engulfed me, and has made me selfish; I can think of nothing else."

"Oh, my dear child, look up and beyond; think of the beautiful resurrection morning, when the just shall appear before the Lord, crowned in beauty. Death should have no terror to the child of God, if, like St. Paul, we can say, 'To live is Christ, to die is gain.' And there is so much left still here to claim your loving thought and attention."

"But life is so sad, auntie, and death is constantly claiming our best beloved. Oh, if there need be no more death," sobbed the young widow.

A tender smile lit up the face of the elderly lady, and a softly-breathed sigh escaped her lips. "There shall be no death there," came in a hushed voice.

"No death there!" The youthful face was gazing now earnestly into her eyes. "Oh, auntie, forgive me, dearest; I had forgotten that you had lost your all."

"Not lost, Abigail; but only gone awhile before into that blessed country whose builder and maker is God."

The eyes were dried now, and were fixed earnestly on the serene face before her.

"Yes, it brings peace to the soul," she said, "a peace that can never come in any other way, to be able always and unreservedly to say, 'thy will, not mine be done.'"

There came the sound of baby laughter, and a moment later little Francis looked inquiringly in. "Come, dearest," said Abigail, smiling, "and let mamma share your joy."

Rainy-Day Pleasures for Children

Blessings on the old-fashioned garret; big, mysterious, full of resources for the rainy day. But, except in country homes, there are no garrets now where the children may romp, and the mother must find or invent quieter ways of play, than romping implies. A soap-bubble party in the nursery is a good rainy-day entertainment. An old volume of illustrated pages, which the children may color with paints and brushes, is a veritable treasure-trove. Leave to work in a doll's hospital, mending the old toys, that they may be sent in good condition to poor children who have few playthings, is also a popular form of enjoyment. Spread an old sheet on the floor; give the children a glue-pot, strong thread, large needles, and a simple tool or two, and let them have a home repair-shop. The day will glide fast, despite the rain.

One of our Darlings

She is three years old, and whenever mother bakes, she has a bit of the dough, and bakes her own wee loaf, to make bread for the birds. She puts her dough to rise just as mother does, and makes her little loaves, and when they are baked, she breaks them into bits to feed the sparrows. I don't wonder that this baby is a generous and tender-hearted little girl. She has started right to make a true lady—a loaf-giver.

Asking Questions

"I always ask for information," said Clarissa, with a complacent air.

"I always ask questions when I have exhausted other means of finding out what I need to know," said Mary, modestly.

Mary's is the better course. To ask questions because you are too lazy to look up their answers in books of reference, or to exercise your own intelligence, is not creditable. On the other hand, there are practical every-day matters on which information can be had by the asking at a proper place and of proper officials. Nobody should stray along an unfamiliar road at a haphazard rate when there are guide-posts, or persons who are equally with guide-posts able to give direction. Merely to ask questions, and personal questions at that, for the sake of finding something to say cannot be condoned in well-bred people. The habit is, indeed, distinctly ill-bred.

HOW CHOICES MAKE CHARACTER

JOSHUA'S PARTING ADVICE

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 9
JOSHUA 24: 14-25

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—JOSHUA 24: 15:
"CHOOSE YE THIS DAY WHOM YE WILL SERVE."

"GOD'S out of doors" were his first temples. Such a temple was Mt. Gerizim. Its organ was the thirty-two springs which bubbled from its side, and flowed down with sweet tinkling sound. It was an ancient temple, for here Abraham had stopped to worship Jehovah when he first came into the Land of Promise. And here, as an act of devotion to the true God, Jacob had buried "the strange gods," which some members of his family had brought with them when they came from Padan-aram.

And as the tombs of the good and great are sometimes found in modern temples, that ancient temple had such a memorial in the tomb of Joseph. More modern temples have had within their walls the coronation of kings and queens. God himself had been freely chosen by the people as their King in this ancient temple, when Joshua had gathered the people there soon after their entrance into the Promised Land. So vast was the Temple, that three millions of people were accommodated in its mountain of galleries, and while they listened to the reading of the Law of God, as given by Moses, there was a deep chorus of amens. And on that day Joshua set up an altar of stones, and sacrifices were offered to the true and living God. And lest the people should forget, the laws of their God were partly written upon the plastered stones of the Temple, as to-day we see them upon the walls of our churches.

Twenty-five years have passed, and again all Israel is to be found within this mountain Temple. The people have been summoned there by their aged leader, now one hundred and ten years old. Joshua is to give his farewell address to the people. But he does not use the occasion for self-praise. Instead, he centres his reminiscences all upon God. He tells how he had in every way fulfilled the promises given to their forefathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in making of them a great nation, and establishing them in the Promised Land. And Joshua makes of it a "crowning day" for God, grander than that which had occurred twenty-five years before, because the throng of people is greater, and there is the imposing appearance of organized forces represented in the elders and judges and officers whom Joshua gathers about him as he stands beside the high altar, which is in the vale of Shechem, midway between the mountain walls of the Temple. "Crown Him, crown Him Lord of all." This is what Joshua means as he says: "Now, therefore, fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth."

The people seem to be loyal to the true God, but Joshua knew well there is disloyalty in some hearts. He throws out a challenge to such as these: "If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve." Coupled with this challenge, he renews his own allegiance to God by saying: "But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord," and this he does, knowing well the power of leadership. And as might be expected, the people exclaim: "God forbid that we should forsake the Lord to seek other gods." But Joshua would give staying qualities to their allegiance, and this he does by trying to impress them with the thought of how strictly God will hold them to their vow. And again and again Joshua causes the people to repeat, in loud chorus, their determination to serve God. What a crowning day is this! And then, to make assurance doubly sure, Joshua writes over a copy of God's laws the oath of loyalty expressed by the people. This he may have done on his own copy, the very one connected with his installation as the leader to follow Moses (Joshua 1:3).

And a great seal is set to the coronation promise of the people: a stone set up by Joshua, under the sacred oak of Abraham, of which Joshua says: "This stone shall be a witness unto us, for it hath heard all the words of the Lord which he spake unto us. It shall, therefore, be a witness unto you lest you deny your God."

Illustration and Application

Now therefore fear Jehovah and serve him.—"Therefore" points back over a long chain of national mercies, from the time God took Abraham, the father of the Jews, from a land of idols (v. 3-13) to make of him a great and godly nation. It is not yet Thanksgiving Day, but it will be Thanksgiving month when this lesson is taught, and therefore "may well carry us back along the path of God's providential deliverances of our fathers, over which we may well write, 'Not with thy sword nor with thy bow' (v. 12). Joshua's argument is the same as Paul's, "I beseech you, therefore, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice" (Rom. 12:1). "Despise thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" (Rom. 2:4). This story of Joshua's appeal to memories of mercies reminds us to consider the complimentary duties of remembering and forgetting. Unforgotten sins neither God nor ourselves can forget. He shall call them to life with that trump of judgment, "Remember" (Luke 16:25). But forgiven sins we should "remember no more," save as we recall them on earth and in heaven as occasions for thankfulness. "Forgetting the things that are behind," sins and sorrows, defeats and victories, let us face to-day.

"All that would hinder us from running the Christian race, all that would impede, must be put behind us, as we bend to our present tasks and face our future. The past must not be a burden which clogs and weights us at every step. Indulgence in the retrospective, self-complaining, self-accusing temper, which is so common, must be seen by us to be a temptation. If we believe in the eternal love of God we must not let any pale ghost of the past, spectral figures of the night, chill our blood and keep us from our pilgrimage. If even your sorrow weakens you, if it is not making you truer and stronger, you must forget it."

Put away the gods which your fathers served. We are not to forget our sins until they are renounced and forgiven. How strange this reference to hidden idols twenty-five years after the crossing of the Jordan! Terah, the father of Abraham, had worshiped idols (v. 2), which Abraham dared to renounce, when to do so was to break with all about him and stand alone for God. When Jacob came back from Haran even his wife Rachel brought idols—stolen ones at that—and now we find these images again in the Land of Promise. But men of to-day are unqualified to throw stones at their superstition who talk of "luck," and are afraid of Friday and of thirteen. "Put away your superstitions" is God's command. One may even be superstitious in his use of the Bible, such as opening at random, and taking the first verse seen as a Divine message. A young fellow in England so opening, lighted on the devil's words, "Cast thyself down, for it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee and in would have saved them. They hesitated, and the next moment the balcony fell back with them upon it into the flames. A lost opportunity to save others ought to seem as sad as a lost opportunity to save ourselves. In one of the old Greek cities was a statue entitled "Opportunity." It was a human figure poised on tiptoe, to signify it remained but a moment, and its feet were winged, to suggest how soon it would be gone.

Remember, three things come not back:
The arrow sent upon its track—
It will not swerve, it will not stay
Its speed: it flies to wound or slay;

The spoken word, so soon forgot
By thee, but it has perished not;
In other hearts 'tis living still,
And doing work for good or ill;

And the lost opportunity
That cometh back no more to thee.
In vain thou weep'st, in vain dost yearn,
Those three will nevermore return.

—From the Arabic.

We should be ever quick to choose not only the good, but the best. Men often stop with "the better," which a German proverb declares is "a great enemy of the best." A famous oculist gave up cricket, not because it was bad, but because it affected unfavorably his delicacy of touch, suggesting that one should much more renounce any amusement or occupation that would prevent his being the best possible Christian.

But the will's greatest achievement is not swift choice of the best, but persistent adherence to it. The writer, shortly after the Civil War, visited Yorktown, Virginia, where the mud embankments were still standing, above which towered the monument of Cornwallis' surrender that closed the Revolution. In a chimney by Ford's Manor house was a hole, manifestly made by a grape or canister. A negro at work near-by was asked, "When was that chimney wounded?" Was it in the last war, or was it in the Revolution? He replied, "I don't know, boss; how long ago was the resolution?" There was a good deal of resolution in the Revolution; otherwise our fathers would never have gotten out of the snows of Valley Forge, crimsoned with the blood of their half-clad feet, to tread in triumph the heights of Yorktown. Good resolutions, both of Churches or individuals, are good as far as they go. They hold up ideals, and they help a little in realizing them; but what we most need is resolution without the "s," firm, determined purpose, like that of Joshua, who said, "As for me and my house—whatever anybody else may do—we will serve the Lord." Let us also say with the people, "We also will serve the Lord." When Joshua answered, "Ye cannot serve the Lord," he was, of course, only testing them; bidding them count the cost; making them realize that it would be no easy thing to be always loyal to God. There is danger that ministers and teachers, eager to help the unsaved to make the great choice, will hide or minimize the difficulties that are sure to be met, and will be met the more successfully if they are not unexpected.

So Joshua made a covenant . . . and took a great stone and set it up. It is often said that one can be a Christian without making any profession, that is, any promise. But every man who knows either history or human nature knows that, although promises are often thoughtlessly made and wilfully broken, and even vows and oaths as well, yet almost any man is more likely to do a thing if he has solemnly promised to do so, especially if it is a written or public promise, much more if it is a vow or oath. Covenants and monuments made in our best moments help to hold us in our worst. They make it "harder to do wrong and easier to do right." Hence a man who would hold himself to his best convictions should covenant with others, as in church membership, that he may help and be helped in realizing the noblest purposes. We should join the Church, that is, join God and the godly, because God commands it, even if we could not see the reasons; but when we find it in accord with the methods of business and of government, with human nature and history, so much the more. And not alone by vows, but by monumental sacraments and by helpful fellowships and instructions, the Church helps to do their best all who come within it.

As we bid the aged General Joshua good-bye, his noble life kindles in us the wish to live and die as worthily.

Let me but live my life from year to year
With forward face and unreluctant soul,
Not hastening to nor turning from the goal;
Nor mourning for the things that disappear
In the dim past, nor holding back in fear
From what the future veils; but with a whole
And happy heart, that pays its toll
To Youth and Age and travels on with cheer:

So let the way wind up the hill or down,
Through rough or smooth, the journey will be joy;
Still seeking what I sought when but a boy,
New friendships, high adventure and a crown,
I shall grow old, but never lose life's zest,
Because the road's last turn will be the best.

—Henry Van Dyke.

NABLOUS, THE SITE OF ANCIENT SHECHEM. THE SCENE OF JOSHUA'S FAREWELL

their hands shall they bear thee up." He read no more; paid no heed to the context, which showed the words were a temptation of the devil; but ran to the second-story window and jumped out. The fourteen days his bruises kept him abed, let us hope, were sufficient to induce him to put away at least that one of his superstitions. When we see how few sailings or weddings occur on Friday, and that all hotels skip room "thirteen," and how many will not sit down to eat in a company of thirteen, we cannot boast ourselves much over idolaters, especially not when we see how titles and wealth are worshiped, even when these are but the gilding of weakness and wickedness. Put away these gods and serve ye Jehovah. To put anything above the will of God is to make it a real idol, and is treason to God, a supreme sin. His kingdom must be first. "In sincerity" means, literally, without wax—sine cera—a reference to honey that is carried over to holiness. "In sincerity and in truth." Truth is more than sincerity. It is a great thing to be sincere—pure honey—no hypocrisy in our words to God or man; but one may be sincerely wrong, like Saul of Tarsus. We must, therefore, not rest in our sincerity but seek the truth itself—reality. Over and over we need to be reminded of the prayer, "Lord, make me real."

Choose ye this day whom ye will serve. This clarion call to the human will has echoed and re-echoed down the ages. It is our choices that determine our characters. A man may choose in one great moment to be a good man for ever, as Joshua chose. But even then he must daily choose whether he will go on or go back in every moral issue he encounters. But, on the other hand, no one chooses at once to be a bad man. The stories of men and women deliberately selling themselves to the devil's service forever are but legends. One does not choose to be a bad man but only to do a bad act "just this once."

"SOW AN ACT AND YOU REAP A TENDENCY; SOW A TENDENCY AND YOU REAP A HABIT; SOW A HABIT AND YOU REAP A CHARACTER; SOW A CHARACTER AND YOU REAP A DESTINY."

"Decision of character!" What a profound term is that! Success in every department of life turns chiefly on having a will that is quick but not a "quitter." At San Angelo, Texas, a hotel was burning. All had escaped but seven women and children, who were huddled in terror on a balcony. Blankets were held below and they were told to jump. Swift decision

A Shadow Lifter

...BY...
EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

THE house surgeon stood by one of the large windows of the hospital, looking abstractedly into the street below. A cynical smile was becoming habitual to his handsome face, and his eyes were grown world weary.

The rain was falling heavily, and the street was deserted, save for a few hurrying pedestrians and belated carriages.

Directly in front of the window an atom in rags tried manfully to dispose of his limp sheets of the latest news.

"Herald an' Tribune, mister?" The eager eyes were lifted wistfully to his.

He threw up the window and tossed a fifty cent piece on the pavement. "Here you! Take that and go home." In an instant the silver was hidden among the rags, and the contents of his pack came hurtling through the window.

"Ugh! You little rascal!" and the house surgeon started back in disgust, "who wants your wet rags in here?"

"I allers gives good valley for my shiners, mister. Golly, but you're a daisy! That'll put Slinky an' me both up at the Refuge, with brekfus in the mornin' an' mebbe a chance at the tuckout at the Mission in the artemnoon. Good luck ter yer, mister. Come, Slinky," and seizing the brother newsboy, he hurried away.

More heavily fell the rain. The hospital ambulance came slowly into view. What had influenced their impatient Jehu to drive at such a snail's pace? Impelled by a strange interest, he went down to the entrance, where nurses were in waiting. The ambulance attendants lifted the stretcher carefully and laid it on the rest in the hall, and then the patient's eyes opened and rested full upon the house surgeon's face.

A pause followed. Dr. Thorpe turned to his assistant. "What location?" he asked in a low voice.

"Ward 16, centre."

"Impossible! The noise would kill her."

The assistant shrugged his shoulders. "She is not a paying patient, you know."

"There is the King's Daughters' corner," said the house surgeon. "That bed has been empty for a week. Take her there, and I will telephone the president at once."

Late that night he walked through the long public ward to the cosy corner which the King's Daughters had furnished, and where they paid for a bed. The new patient was lying motionless. She had roused once, the nurse told him, to take a little nourishment, but her exhaustion was extreme.

He lifted the card at the head of the bed, and read it curiously.

NAME—Comfort Carrol. Age—29.
RESIDENCE No. 62 Schuyler Street.
DENOMINATION A Christian.

A strange fascination drew him towards the bed again, and while he held the wrist in his professional fingers, his eyes studied the face upon the pillow. It could not be called beautiful, the features were too irregular, but the mouth had an indefinable sweetness about it, a subtle fineness, which appealed to the higher nature within him, which he tried to disbelieve in—and failed.

It was visiting day at the hospital. "The King's Corner," as the new patient's domicile had come to be called, had held a strange array of guests. "The Courtiers" a nurse said. Boys had been there of every age and description; boys whose faces were bronzed by the heat and struggle of life, whose hands were hardened by its toil. The screen which for so many weeks of prostration had shut off "The King's Corner" from the other portion of the ward, was folded back, and the other patients found themselves taking a wonderful interest in the animated group about the frail woman who had already found means to speak to the heart of them all. The house surgeon looked on bewildered.

"Number Sixty-two looks real snifty, Miss Comfort, don't it just?" and the speaker looked round upon the other boys for confirmation.

"I tell yer!" came in ready response.

"Pete sweeps the carpets, an' Dan does the dustin' an' I shined the winders yesterday, ready for our next meetin' yer know. You'll soon be able ter cum back, won't yer, Miss Comfort? The house seems full o' holes."

"I hope so, Joe," she answered cheerily.

"How are Jack and Jill?"

"Oh, prime! They're fit ter split their throats with singin' from mornin' ter night, Mrs. Bacon says."

"An' we're learnin' a fine chorus ter sing the night you come home, Miss Comfort," began a little Italian, and then checked himself shamefacedly. "Oh, I forgot! That's one o' the surprises."

"We'll have ter run yer tongue inter port, Tony, ef it lets off so much steam," said Dick, good-naturedly. "I tends ter Toodles, Miss Comfort, brushes his coat three times a week, an' it shines just like satin; an' Bob, he tends ter the flowers. Phew! You never see such flowers as is a'growin' at number sixty-two!"

"Thank you all so much!" and the invalid beamed upon them. "I was certain you would take care of them all for me. And what does David do?" She looked kindly at a clumsy, overgrown boy.

"I takes care of the white lady."

"You bet he does!" cries the irrepressible Tony. "He's a'most wore out yer feather duster, an' I think her nose is a'growin' shiny, he whisks it so much."

"Boys," she said suddenly, "where is our 'Atom'? Why did he not come?"

"Well, yer 'see, Miss Comfort, there couldn't be the hull of us come, 'count uv yer feelins', yer know, an' the Atom's so tuk up with Slinky that he couldn't seem ter git away. He's a reglar jailer, Slinky is."

"Why, what is the matter with him?"

"Oh, he's been monkeyin' round with colds an' things," explained Dick, in a tone of supreme contempt. "Ain't got no grit, yer know. Gets sick ef he wets his feet—baby!"

"We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please ourselves." What a way that silvery voice had of making words tell! (Yet, as Tony expressed it, "She never spoke at a feller, it was just as ef she was thinkin' to herself.") "You don't forget these days, lads," she said, and her voice was tender, "that you are 'The King's Own'?"

During the Silence which followed, Dick rose quietly. "I'm goin' ter give the Atom a chance," he whispered, as several had to move to let him past, and, with ready chivalry, they understood.

"Your Legion of Honor is very devoted, Miss Carrol," said the house surgeon with his quizzical smile, standing beside her chair as the last of her visitors filed away. He had fallen into the habit of pausing there on his professional visitations. There were so many things about this new patient hard to be understood. "Are you the patron saint of all the boys in the city, may I ask?"

"I should like to be. Dear fellows, they are so warm-hearted! Two or three began coming to my rooms twice a week for study (they are so anxious to improve themselves), and they brought their friends, and so it has grown."

"Them's fer her." The Atom stood panting eagerly at the door of the ward, but visitors' hours were over, and all rules were strictly enforced at St. Bartholomew's.

"You can't see Miss Carrol to-day," the nurse told him, not unkindly. "Maybe you will next week, if you are in time." How could she know how far away next week seemed to him!

He held a paper bag towards her. "I couldn't cum before, 'cause Slinky's ben sick, too, an' I've hed ter tend him. Tell her—" and a ragged sleeve was brushed hastily across a pair of quivering lips; "tell her I'm orful sorry."

The nurse carried the present and the message to "The King's Corner." The patient looked at the luscious oranges with a wistful smile. She knew just how much of self-denial they represented.

She asked to have the five o'clock, with its dainty china, moved nearer to her chair, and, selecting the prettiest plate, began to fashion the finest orange into a tulip of gorgeous hue.

The house surgeon stood looking on. How deft her fingers were! She laid down her fruit knife at last, with a smile.

"Now, nurse, will you carry this, please,

"Are you not trying to make the world stronger, to lift it nearer to God?"

"How little you understand!" he exclaimed.

"More than you know," she said, softly. "All living seems to me such a mockery!" the lips twitched under the heavy moustache.

"Below the outer garment of our lives there lies a hidden meaning," she said. "We must look beyond to get the true adjustment. We cannot hope to read the riddle, either, from this side of the curtain; it is like being behind the screen at a stereopticon performance. The only thing for us to do now is to keep the slides moving."

"How do you make people love you?" he cried impetuously. "What alchemy do you use to win the hearts of all?"

She laughed. "I love them first—that is my secret."

"Do you love everyone?" he asked wonderingly.

"Yes," she said softly, "with the love of Christ."

The house surgeon turned away abruptly. At this moment he felt jealous of the world.

Number Sixty-two was in festive array, for Comfort Carrol was at home again.

to little Polly Smith? And then, when you come back, I will have the other one ready."

Dr. Thorpe turned on his heel, impatiently. Why did he always feel himself so insignificant before her, this woman with whom self was such an unknown quantity?

She did not grow strong quickly. There were days when she was not able to see her visitors, days when even a walk down the ward to sit beside some of the other convalescent patients seemed a great undertaking.

The house surgeon looked at her weary face one afternoon, disapprovingly. "You are killing yourself!" he said. "These people do not appreciate you. They tear your sympathy to shreds. It will not pay."

"Oh, yes, it will; it does!" she answered, her face aglow. "Why, Dr. Thorpe, it is what you are doing all the time."

"I!" he echoed, in astonishment.

As she rested, after the boys had left, she looked with a smile at the evidences of their loving care. "Dear fellows," she whispered, "how loyal they are!"

Hearing a footstep, she turned her head. "Why, Dr. Thorpe!" she exclaimed.

"You are utterly weary!" he said, disapprovingly, laying his finger upon her pulse.

"How can I be weary with such dear boys to love me?"

He shook his head. "You are not strong enough for such a strain."

She smiled up at him. "How are all my friends at St. Bartholomew's?"

"The King's Corner" is desolate without you, and the whole ward seems empty—to me."

"It is very good of you all to care," she said.

He leaned forward suddenly and took her hand in his.

"If you would only give me the right to care for you!" he cried. "I, too, am a part of humanity. Comfort—Miss Carrol—will you comfort me?"

A College Course at Home

A Practical System for those who wish to Educate Themselves

COURSE I.—Elementary

By EDGAR VANDERBILT, Principal of Public School, No. 55, New York City

[The following course of home study, forms the first of a series prepared for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by a number of practical educators. This course is essentially simple—others of a more advanced order will follow, and the reader must decide for himself which plan is adapted to his particular needs. The subjects here suggested are few; the books are not difficult to master, but whoever undertakes this course, and devotes to it his best energies during the hours he can spare for his own instruction, will find himself possessed of a solid groundwork of education.—EDITOR.]

THE course of study outlined below is thoroughly elementary. It is intended for those whose early education has been neglected. A present knowledge of any one of the subjects suggested is so much gained, and therefore one or more subjects may be substituted, according to the time at the disposal of the home student, or his special inclination. If the greater part or all the subjects can be mastered in the course of time the student will have a fair elementary education, and will be in a position to lay out for himself a future course of more advanced studies.

The Subjects

The following is a list of subjects which every one should master: Grammar, Spelling, and English Literature; Arithmetic; Geography; Ancient, Modern, and United States History; Physiology; Botany; and Zoology.

Hours of Study

Those engaged in their regular occupations during the day should not attempt more than two hours of study each day, perhaps forty minutes in the morning and twice as much in the evening. To make the most of these two hours a regular schedule should be laid out and adhered to, similar to the plan of study suggested below. For many it may not be possible to take up such an extended list of subjects simultaneously. In that case, they may be satisfied to commence their studies by taking up History, Geography, Arithmetic, English Grammar, and a few masterpieces of English first, leaving the other subjects for a more convenient time. But each scholar may regulate the time to suit his own convenience. However much or little he may undertake, he should thoroughly master every point before proceeding.

A CONVENIENT PLAN FOR A WEEK'S WORK

40 Minutes for Each Subject:

| | | | |
|-----------|-----------------|------------|-----------|
| MONDAY | ENG. GRAMMAR | ARITHMETIC | GEOGRAPHY |
| TUESDAY | ENG. LITERATURE | PHYSIOLOGY | HISTORY |
| WEDNESDAY | ENG. GRAMMAR | ARITHMETIC | SPELLING |
| THURSDAY | GEOGRAPHY | BOTANY | ZOOLOGY |
| FRIDAY | ENG. GRAMMAR | ARITHMETIC | HISTORY |
| SATURDAY | RECREATION | | |
| SUNDAY | REST | | |

As progress is made in Spelling, Arithmetic and Geography, more time may be devoted to History. U. S. History should be studied first, then Ancient, and then Modern, especially English.

The following list of text-books will serve to give a thorough elementary knowledge of the subjects suggested. In many cases the student may already possess, or be able to borrow, other text-books covering practically the same ground, and any experienced teacher would give advice on this subject. After the title of the book is given the name of the publisher:

Text-books Suggested.

English Grammar. Longmans English Grammar. (Longmans, Green & Co., New York.) Graves' New Graded Speller. (Ginn & Co., New York.)

Literature. Shaw & Backus' Outlines of Literature, English and American. (Butler, Sheldon & Co., New York.)

Masterpieces. For beginners: Goldsmith's Traveller and Deserted Village; Longfellow's Hiawatha; Hawthorne's Tanglewood Tales; Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin; For the more advanced: Hudson's edition of Julius Caesar and Macbeth; Longfellow's Evangeline; Lowell's Vision of Sir Launfal; Scott's Ivanhoe; Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield; Tennyson's The Princess; Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome; George Eliot's Silas Marner; Cooper's Last of the Mohicans; Irving's Sketch-book.

How They Filled the Coal Bin

From Erangelist Gubb's Autobiography

I remember once going down to the coal bin for coal, and being able to scrape up only about half a hod full. The night was bitter cold. I said to my wife, "This is all the coal we have." She said, "Well, put it in the stove. It is such a cold night we must keep the fire going." I said "What are we going to do for coal in the morning? I think we had better save the coal for morning." "No," said she. "It will be better to keep the fire. Put it in, and we'll tell the Lord all about it. He owns the coal in all the mines." I had but mighty little faith and no money, and did hate to see the coal go into that fire; but in it went. Then we knelt down and told the Lord our need. In the morning mail, before the fire had gone out, there came a letter from an unknown person enclosing five dollars. We ordered the coal.

A Prisoner's Gift

Mr. O. S. M., Richmond, Va., a reader of this journal, writes:

One of the prisoners of the Virginia Penitentiary, at a recent session of the Sunday School, expressed a desire to contribute a dollar to the missionary cause, and gave me an order on the financial officer of the institution for the amount. It was done without any solicitation or suggestion on the part of any one, so far as my knowledge extends, and I hope it may prove an inspiration to others more favorably circumstanced to do likewise.

If You Are a Pianist or a Singer

you are constantly buying sheet music—and paying high prices for it. It lies in ragged piles around the house and becomes scattered and torn. You lose money by buying music in that way, to say nothing of your loss of time and temper when searching for a particular selection. Why not buy your music in volumes filled with the best selections, and thoroughly indexed? The "Library of the World's Best Music" is designed for your needs. Its eight volumes—sheet music size, but light and easy to handle—are crowded with the best vocal and instrumental music, carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors. If you were to buy the music it contains, one piece at a time, it would cost you over $200.00. Through our Musical Library Club—for a limited time—the entire set will cost you one-tenth of that amount, and you can pay it in little payments of $1.00 a month.

A Bookcase Free if you order at Once.

The World's Best Music

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 inches.

This is the most comprehensive collection of music in existence. It contains 2,200 pages of sheet music—which is 500 more than any other Musical Library. It is fully indexed, so that any selection can be quickly found. The volumes are specially bound so that they open flat at the piano. All the world-famous composers are represented—including such names as Wagner, Liszt, Paderewski, Sullivan, Mozart, Handel, Chopin, De Koven, Strauss and Gounod—but the selections have been so carefully made that none is too difficult for the average performer. The work contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets. Among the selections are 100 new and copyrighted pieces of music by American composers. As a musical encyclopedia it is unexcelled, for it contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits, many of the last being handsome chromatic art plates in colors. The volumes are handsomely bound in art cloth and half-leather. In number of pages of sheet music, number of biographies, and in number of illustrations, this Musical Library leads all others.

The Coupon Cuts the Price in Half

Our Musical Library Club has secured an entirely new edition of the "World's Best Music" at a price slightly above the cost of paper and printing. On this account we are able to offer these sets at about half the regular subscription price—payable $1.00 a month. Through the Musical Library Club—direct from the publisher to the customer—you can secure a set for $21.00 in cloth binding and $25.00 for the half-leather. These sets were previously sold for $35.00 and $40.00. The edition is small, so to avoid possible disappointment in failing to secure a set, cut off the coupon to-day, sign it, and mail it to us. We will then send you a set (express paid by us) for examination. After five days' use, if you are not satisfied, return the books to us at our expense. But if you decide to keep the set, send us $1.00 at the expiration of five days, and $1.00 a month thereafter, until the full amount is paid.

BOOKCASE FREE

We have a small number of elegant oak-wood book cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain one of them free with your set it is necessary to send your order before November 24th. If your order is received after that date we cannot send a bookcase with your set, unless you care to pay the retail price of $4.00.

Nearly Killed the Nurse.

When one of the family is sick, Mother seems to be the only person who can tenderly nurse the patient back to health. But we forget sometimes that it is pretty hard on Mother.

Mrs. Propst of Albany, Ore., says:—"About twenty-seven months ago, Father suffered with a stroke of paralysis, confining him to his bed for months, and as he wished Mother with him constantly, his care in a great measure fell to her lot. She was seventy-four years old, and through constant attendance upon my father, lost both sleep and rest, and began drinking coffee in quantities until finally she became very weak, nervous and ill herself.

By her physician's order, she began giving Father both Postum Food Coffee and Grape-Nuts, and in that way began using both herself. The effect was very noticeable. Father improved rapidly, and Mother regained her strength and health, and now both are well and strong. Mother says it is all due to the continued use of both Postum and Grape-Nuts."

Isaac Pitman's
20th Century
Revision

By Special Arrangement with Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, N. Y.

LESSON XXII. Grammalogues.

189. The list of grammalogues given in this lesson contains a number of logograms additional to those already given in connection with the exercises. By means of this table, in which the signs are grouped phonetically, and the directions furnished below, they may be readily committed to memory. Alphabetic characters are used to represent all the grammalogues except and, he, and therefore, for which convenient signs are allocated.

190. The POSITIONS of the logograms, ABOVE, ON, and THROUGH the line, are in general determined by the vowels contained in the words; and if a word has more than one syllable, by its accented vowel. For perpendicular and sloping strokes, standing alone, the positions are:—

1. ah, aw, ä, ö, i, oi, wi ABOVE the line; thus, at.
 2. eh, oh, ë, ü, ON the line; thus, whether.
 3. ee, oo, i, öö, ow, ü, THROUGH the line; thus, each.
191. Vowel, logograms, and horizontal and half-sized consonants, have but two positions.
1. ah, aw, ä, ö, i, oi, ay, wi, ABOVE the line; as, ah.
 2. eh, oh, ë, ü, ee, oo, i, öö, ü, ON the line; as, 100.

These rules do not apply to the irregular grammalogues set out in the table in this lesson.

192. It will be noticed that in the tables of grammalogues some words are indicated with a hyphen, as, (give-n); or, with a double termination, as, (important-ly). The corresponding logograms represent both give and given, important and importance.

193. In order to mark the plural number, the possessive case of a noun, or a third person singular of a verb, s may be added to a logogram; thus, good, goods; God, Gods; come, comes.

194. A logogram may be used either as a prefix or suffix; thus, afternoon, undertake, hereafter, indifferent.

195. Irregular grammalogues are of two descriptions, namely,
1. Those of frequent occurrence, written ON THE LINE for convenience. These are

The student having advanced to this stage, is now advised to read some book printed in the corresponding style of shorthand, and we recommend for this purpose either of the following: Phonographic Reader or Select Readings No. 1, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand notes. Either of these works will be sent post-paid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orders should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XXIII. will appear in the issue of Nov. 12.

Why Don't You Sing?

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, National President of the W. C. T. U., relates how at the close of the funeral services of Sheriff Pearson, which she attended at the Gospel Mission, where, for nearly twenty-five years, he had labored, the audience, consisting largely of those to whom he had been a constant inspiration, arose and sang his favorite hymn, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." Looking down, she saw his own daughter, Evangeline, joining her voice with the others in the dear familiar words. Afterwards she explained to Mrs. Stevens how she could sing at such a time.

"I seemed to hear my father saying, 'Sing, Vangie! Why don't you sing?' Just as he used to do."

Doubtless she possessed something of his spirit and was animated by his own unselfish devotion, as he went bravely on with his work, while his heart was aching in loneliness for the dear companion of whom he had been bereaved.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Journey Through Shensi*

WHEN Mr. Francis H. Nichols something over a year ago, set out on his journey across China, from Tientsin via Peking, to Shensi, the most ancient and least known province of the Celestial empire, he went as the Special Commissioner of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the purpose of telling its readers what had been accomplished in that distant land, by the relief fund they had contributed in aid of the famine sufferers. His remarkably interesting series of letters of travel appeared in this journal, presenting a graphic picture of famine conditions, and shedding a flood of light upon a part of the world till then little known, and to whose people a white traveler was a rare visitor. Mr. Nichols has just completed and issued, through the publishing house of Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, a volume entitled Through Hidden Shensi, in which he relates, with graphic detail, and at much greater length than was possible in the columns of a weekly publication, the story of his remarkable journey. It is one of the most instructive books of travel that has appeared in many years. Shensi, he describes as "a naturally gray land of dim beginnings" that has lingered far from world highways. On the plain and in the mountains live a people who have always been as they are now; who are so continuously old, that on first acquaintance they appear dull from sheer lack of any trace of racial youthfulness.

It was among this strange people that Mr. Nichols passed several months, living as they lived, mingling with them freely and unconsciously, learning to respect and to love them. "I found that they had achieved much," he writes, "but were free from boastings; that they loved their own kind of learning; they strove to do right as they saw the right." As a result of continuous social contact and friendly intercourse, the traveler ultimately came to see things in some measure through their eyes, and to accept their point of view. . . . I appreciated the seeming absurdity of an attempt to pass the torch of an imported civilization to a land where its own had always burned."

But, wholly apart from the praiseworthy purpose of doing justice to China—plundered, abused, maltreated, the "butt of the world"—Mr. Nichols' book should be widely read as the first extended account we have had of these peculiar dwellers at China's ancient seat—Sian. Their hatred to foreigners, who invaded and desecrated their land, and mocked at their most sacred traditions, was not altogether surprising. Yet our author, as befitted a man on a mission of peace and good will, traveled 1,500 miles through the very heart of the empire unmolested. At the outset he provided himself with proper credentials, among them a queer-looking personal card from Prince Ching, whom he met in Peking. Ching is a Manchurian, uncle of the Emperor, and the foremost figure in the Government. His autograph proved an open sesame; wherever the traveler displayed it, doors were swung wide, and the hospitality extended.

To follow the fortunes of the traveler from Tientsin to the capital, thence across the country to Paoting, and on to his destination in Sian, one must read the book. It is a fascinating story, picturesque, right with bits of quaint Oriental humor. The land of Fu-Hi and the dragon, Shensi is full of interest, and Mr. Nichols has kept his eyes open and his keen American wits at work to excellent purpose. His tale of travel there is like a long, delightful panorama of ever-changing pictures, which show us the real life of the people, their religious observances, their labors and their diversions; their eas and customs as to marriage, dress, food, morals, traveling, marketing, etc.; their quaint art and quaint architecture; their literary standards and educational methods; their spirit and ancestor worship, and alas! their national evil—the opium habit.

One of the most attractive chapters in the book is that devoted to the royal exile of Emperor Kwang Su, at Sian. Mr. Nichols relates how he visited the palace where the exile had been, a few weeks before. After some peculiarly Chinese maneuvering by his servant, Wang, the traveler was admitted.

With my previous experience of mandarins, I had pictured the man in charge of the vacant palace as being well advanced in years and exceptionally grave and sedate. I was quite unprepared for such a youthful mandarin as the one who returned with the soldier to the gate. He was not more than twenty-five years old. He wore a purple silk tunic and a gray kilt. The button on his cap indicated his rank unmistakably. . . . I requested permission to walk through the palace grounds. "The Son of Heaven lived here," he said, "and no one can enter the place where he has been. But come into my office, I want to talk to you." He led the way to a little building just inside the gate. "I, too, am a foreigner," said the young mandarin, as a servant brought us some tea. "My home is in Sichuan. I have been only a year in Shensi. Sichuan is a beautiful land, where there are waterfalls and high mountains and bamboo forests." As he talked of home the stiffness and official reserve vanished.

"Whenever I think of my native land," said the mandarin, "my thoughts take the form of music. One cannot speak in words of such a thing as home." From a drawer in a cabinet in the corner of the room, he took out a zither and laid it on the table in front of him. "I am on a Sichuan mountain," he said. "The sun is shining down on me through the bamboo leaves. I can hear the sound of a waterfall, and white rabbits are playing near me. It is one of the hours when one cannot help being happy." His fingers ran over the zither-strings; his dark Sichuanese face lighted; his eyes sparkled. For the moment he seemed oblivious of us and everything about him. His playing, soft at first, grew louder and faster and lingered on the high notes; then died away in a dreamy monotony in about the middle of the scale.

"I have played to you," he said, springing up from the table, "in order that the music might make you feel the love we have for our country, so that you would respect it. If you do that you will also respect the place where my Emperor has lived. The responsibility of admitting anyone to these grounds rests with me. I usually do not allow my countrymen to enter, for even they cannot realize what a solemn thing it is to walk through the rooms from which my country has been ruled. You could not be expected to respect the palace, because you are a barbarian, and so I refused when you asked me for permission to walk through the grounds. But I have changed my mind. You understand what the zither said. You are my friend. I will myself show you through the palace." I tried to thank him. But the delicacy of the climax had overwhelmed me.

In a vivid chapter, the reading of which causes a shudder, the author describes the terrible famine in Shensi. Wheat had risen to thirteen times its normal price, and bread ten times. By-and-by, human flesh began to be sold in Sian. The relief fund came in time to save many lives. Mr. Nichols writes:

In the feeding of thousands of human beings by the American dollars that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had collected, there were no distinctions of race or creed or politics. . . . They were all Chinese, they were human beings, and they were fed. Before the coming of the American money to Sian, it is probable that two-thirds of the people of Shensi had never heard of the United States. To-day, from one end of the province to the other, it is known as the one foreign nation that is really a friend, and whose people, though barbarians, are strangely kind.

There is a delightful conservatism about Mr. Nichols' book that will at once commend it to the general reader. Nothing is overdone. He takes the middle view of China and its people, and writes with the very decided advantage of a traveler who has won his way to their heartiest confidences and their inmost secrets. Reading Through Hidden Shensi, one gets the true perspective for an accurate and just estimate of the race which, amid all the changes of empire and dominion, of ideas and beliefs elsewhere, has preserved in their strictest integrity, traditions, literature, creed and customs that were old, very old, even in the beginnings of history.

Send for free booklet and letters from physicians, physical instructors, and those who know from experience of our wonderful appliances. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Write to-day for measurement blank. Don't wait.

WESLEYVILLE, PA.

I am permanently relieved of a weak and deformed spine, by the use of the Philo-Burt Company's Appliance. During the six months previous to procuring the appliance, I was unable to stand on my feet. After wearing it for six weeks, I could walk with the aid of crutches, and eight months from the time I first commenced the use of the brace, I could do as much work as any able bodied man. My experience has convinced me that spinal trouble is the cause of many symptoms of disease, that can never be relieved by treating the symptoms, and nothing but some support to remove the weight of the head and shoulders from the spine will give relief. I cannot say too much for your Appliances; they are so light and comfortable (and can be removed so easily) that it is almost a pleasure to wear one.

Mr. List writes the above after 6 years' experience with our appliance, the latter 2 years of which he has not worn any brace or support, PHILO BURT MFG. CO., 30-10th ST., JAMESTOWN, N.Y.

Answers to Question of the Week

What is the great public lesson to be learned from the Pennsylvania coal strike?

Where Government Should Control

It clearly demonstrates the fact that all industries on which the life, health, comfort and necessities of our nation depend, should be directly under government supervision, if not under absolute government control. The position taken by a half-score of men as heads of corporations, or by a horde of oppressed and generally ignorant laborers, that they may rightly deprive a nation of seventy millions of people of the fuel that the Almighty placed in the bowels of the earth for the use of all mankind, and which alone can keep immense numbers of the people from sickness, suffering and death from the effects of cold, is untenable, impertinent and threatening to the nation. WM. W. CASE.

It Teaches that Injustice Never Pays

The lesson is one of justice. Until employers learn that their best course, financially and socially, is to treat those they employ fairly, such strikes will continue. There is no doubt but that God has given the most desirable remedy in the precept of the Golden Rule. As the owners of the coal mines refuse to follow anything so simple, and as great wealth seems to be the mainspring to absolute selfishness, we cannot hope for a change of heart in that direction. It is to be hoped that arbitration will eventually bring about a better condition of things. Meanwhile, we can take the lesson which the coal strike teaches to heart, and that is: Injustice and selfishness never does pay, and never has paid, no matter how prospered those who practice it appear to be in the beginning.

ALICE C. BOYNTON.

A National Labor Committee

That all men are born "free and equal," and are entitled to intelligent, mutual consideration in any business enterprise. Could we secure this mutual consideration, it would mean a more equitable distribution of profits, a better social relationship, a cessation of strikes, an absence of labor riots, and assured national prosperity. I would suggest as a remedy, the appointment by the President of a National Labor Committee, to be approved by Congress, whose duty it should be to adjust all differences between capital and labor. Such a committee, having the approval of Congress and the general public, would soon come to have a weight of influence not to be slighted nor neglected.

ERNEST SMEDLEY.

Labor Can Never Rule Capital

The great public lesson to be learned from the coal strike is, that labor can never rule capital. While the miners' grievance is claimed to be higher wages, the true grievance is recognition of the Union. This would mean that the United Mine Workers would have full control of all collieries. They would dictate to the operators whom they should employ, how many hours a day to work the mines, how much to pay for such and such work, or, in other words, the operators, who own the mines, would have no control of the running of them.

MRS. CHARLES H. WOLFE.

Corporation Power a Menace

The lesson is, that the power of great, wealthy corporations, unrestrained by laws, will be a constant menace to the public welfare and prosperity. Their arbitrary power, exercised to oppress their employees, has a tendency to augment the ranks of the Socialists, and under such circumstances, the future citizenship of their children is not likely to be true and loyal. Hence the lesson of enacting laws, that justice may be done between employers and employees by arbitration.

S. F. ELLIOTTE.

Private Monopolies are Intolerable

It teaches that a monopoly in private hands is intolerable. By a monopoly is meant control of the entire supply of anything. When an individual controls the entire supply of a commodity, he holds the power to exact from would-be purchasers "all that the traffic will stand," regardless of the cost of production. If the thing monopolized be a public necessity, like coal, the wider field of demand vastly increases this power of extortion, and greatly multiplies the temptation to prey on others. For this reason, men are coming to realize, and this strike is bringing many more to realize, that monopoly powers are too great to be entrusted to any man or set of men, it matters not how strong, or honest, or wise they may be.

S. M. CHAPMAN.

It Teaches Compulsory Arbitration

Two great public lessons are to be learned from this lamentable coal strike—one moral, the other industrial. The moral lesson is, the necessity of the law of love between man and man. The other great lesson, is the necessity of compulsory arbitration. Nothing short of that will meet such a crisis as the present. In adopting such a scheme we would not be launching on some new and untried theory. We have the advantage of the working of this law in New Zealand, where it has been of immense advantage. The one outstanding fact is, that in that country there has been no strike for seven years. If such a law had been in force here, what would have been the result? The marvel is, that men are so slow to adopt such a just and reasonable method of avoiding such suicidal, industrial wars.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

The Lesson is—Arbitration

While many lessons might be advantageously drawn from the coal strike, the one which overshadows all others is—the value of Arbitration. Boards of Arbitration or Arbitration Courts, National, State and Municipal, have already been advocated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I think wisely. They are an urgent need of our times, and if we are ever to allay the antagonism which is constantly breaking out between labor and capital, we must follow the example of New Zealand, and have all such disputes referred at the outset to the proper Boards of Arbitration, the Municipal Board having right of appeal to the State tribunal, and the latter to the National Board, which, besides adjudicating

A. M.

A Threefold Lesson.

It teaches that self-interest dulls the moral perceptions, weakens the moral sensibilities, and perverts the conscience to such an extent that it is hopeless to attempt a settlement of a controversy involving self-interest by invoking moral considerations. The political lesson is that the State, the supreme power, should retain or assume control of those things directly affecting the public welfare, and exercise that control whenever the common good is imperiled. The social lesson is the power of organization, and the danger of allowing within the society the existence of organizations having conflicting interests, liable at any time to become actively hostile.

sure, not to be sought while there is the slightest hope of reformation. The children of bad fathers are sometimes so disgusted by the spectacle of their father's misconduct, and so much impressed with the goodness of their mother, as to avoid the evil habits of their father. There are, however, cases in which the father's conduct is of such a character as to render divorce a duty.

A. J. S. What was the origin of the old British custom of burying at the junction of four cross roads the bodies of those who, for any reason, were excluded from holy rites?

Wherever two roads crossed it was customary to raise a cross—the place being self-consecrated, according to the piety of the age. Here, in a spirit of charity and by no means as an indignity, as some have thought, were interred the remains of those who had been denied the privilege of burial in consecrated ground.

M. W. B. Bainbridge, Pa. 1. What is the average size of the human head? 2. What relation exists between the weight of the brain and the intelligence of the individual?

1. About twenty-one inches is the greatest circumference of the average head in this country and Great Britain. The Lapps of Europe, have the largest heads in proportion to their stature of any people. The natives of Nubia and New Guinea have the smallest heads. 2. Roughly speaking, there is a relation. The human brain is larger and heavier than that of any other animal except the elephant and great whale. There is a mini-

AN EARNEST APPEAL FROM DR. KLOPSCH

LAST year I issued a personal card to our subscribers, asking them to help me to give them the very best service possible by sending in their renewals during the month of November. The response was so exceptionally gratifying that we were enabled to give the most thorough satisfaction, while the care and responsibility incident to the busiest season of the year were so agreeably distributed that I personally was relieved of much anxiety and worryment.

This year our list is much larger than ever before. We rejoice in that fact, because it gratifyingly emphasizes the wider distribution of good, helpful and wholesome literature, and we are more desirous than ever to give the best service at our command. But without the same kind co-operation, we fear we could not do as well as last year.

I therefore earnestly request that our subscribers, as a personal favor, send in their renewals during the month of November. As every subscription will be renewed from the date of present expiry, no subscriber loses anything by renewing a little ahead of time, but such kind co-operation affords me great relief at a time when our mail averages about ten thousand letters a day.

New York, Oct. 28, 1902.

Miscellaneous Questions

J. H. W., Crawford, N. J. Who wrote: "Peace is conquest?"

You are thinking, perhaps, of the words Shakespeare puts into the Archbishop's mouth, when he says (in Henry IV), to opposing factions:

A peace is of the nature of a conquest; for then both parties nobly are subdued, and neither party loses.

A. D. D. What are the best substitutes for coal as fuel?

This is too large a question to fully answer here. The most obvious substitute is, of course, wood. Peat is used in Ireland, Scotland, Bavaria, Switzerland, and parts of Germany and France. It may be obtained in many boggy regions of this country, and, when dried in the air and pressed, forms an excellent fuel. The common fuel of India and Egypt is the refuse of animals, dried in the sun. In some parts of France and Germany, the peasants burn tan cakes, which are made from spent tanner's bark. The same class of fuel made from exhausted dye-wood is considered to be equal to two-thirds of its weight in coal. In some parts of Europe, seaweed is extensively used for fuel.

Christian Wife, Philadelphia, Pa. Is it a wife's duty to continue living with her husband when his conduct has become so bad as to threaten the moral ruin of their children? Ought she not for their sake to get a divorce?

Is there no possibility of his reformation? The Holy Spirit can change the worst natures. Earnest prayer for the husband's conversion, and a patient, consistent Christian life on the part of the wife have done much, in many cases, to bring about a change. To obtain a divorce is to abandon all hope of reformation. We do not know sufficient of the circumstances to advise, but would always urge a wife to regard divorce as an extreme mea-mum weight (about 30 oz.) below which man's intellectual power is dwarfed, and which is generally associated with imbecility or idiocy. But heavy brain weight does not necessarily indicate extraordinary intelligence. The average brain weight is 50 oz., but a case of senile dementia is on record in which the brain weighed 60 1/2 oz.; and there are numerous instances in which imbeciles and idiots have shown brain weight above the average. There is here, as in everything else, the question of quality as well as quantity. Size, sex and age of the individual are factors. The brain of a small, brilliant woman might weigh less than that of a large, stupid man; and that of an intelligent child fall below that of an adult idiot. One of the most humane things modern science is attempting is the development of the brain power of those whose intellects are feeble or darkened.

L. P. C., Yarmouth, N. S. In what poem on "Autumn" do these lines occur:

No clouds are in the morning sky;
Who says that life and love can die?

E. C. Stedman's "Autumn Song" has a stanza which reads thus:

No clouds are in the morning sky,
The vapors hug the stream,
Who says that life and love can die
In all this northern gleam?
At every turn the maples hum,
The quail is whistling free,
The partridge whirs and the frosted bars
Are dropping for you and me—
In the clear October morning.

J. S. A., Pasadena. The Red Sea is so called on account of the color of the waters, due to a microscopic sea-weed. So small are the plants, that in a square inch there are some 25,000,000 individuals.

Mr. George E. Berner, of Mt. Carmel, Pa., writes that forty-eight boys and girls of that place (which is in the centre of the anthracite region) are attending leading schools and colleges in different parts of the country. This speaks well for the intellectual progress of Carmel.

BRIGHT LITTLE SUNSHINERS

"SUNSHINE QUEEN"

THERE are something like 50,000 Junior Sunshiners. Their interest just now is centered in Christmas work; there are already several hundred Empty Stocking Sunshine Clubs. The object of these bands is to find all the little boys and girls who are not likely to have a visit from Santa Claus Christmas time, and then, on the sly, manage to get stockings hung up in the chimney so that the little folks will be surprised and made happy because of having been remembered like other little boys and girls in the neighborhood. Outside of the Empty Stocking Club activities, each member is doing his or her own industrial good cheer work. Little Katherine June Ayers, of Detroit, Mich., daughter of the state president, Mrs. Mabel L. Ayers, is known everywhere as "Sunshine." She likes to sit in the Sunshine Flower Mission, and give out the flowers to the children who come for bouquets. Little Melande McClure is known as the little Sunshine Queen of Los Angeles, Cal. She is a member of the junior branch there, and is made queen of every carnival held by the workers.

Don't you want to start an Empty Stocking branch? All you have to do is to send to Miss Ella Klein, president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Branch, office, Bible House, New York. Cut out the pledge, sign your full name with address, and a membership card will be forwarded you, as well as an Empty Stocking mite box. Your name will be recorded and your work may begin. Send two-cent stamp for reply.

My Dear President General: We wish to join the International Sunshine Society, promising to pay our initiation fee in the form of some act carrying sunshine into another life within one month from date. We also promise to pay annual dues each in the form of a kind act. We agree to report the nature and circumstance of these acts to the branch President, who will report directly to the general office.

Mrs. J. H. Bailey, of Tola, Va. (express office, Brookneal, Va.), has three boys under twelve years of age, who would be happy to receive sunshine in any form. Their lives are spent on a lonely farm, which yields a poor living. Miss Flora Matthews, Daisy, Florida, sends us a request for clothing for a poor dependent woman of twenty-five. Miss Kate Folsom, Shacklet, Stafford County, Va., wants clothing for her sewing-class of girls of all ages. Some are very destitute. Do not forget Alice Santmier, 108 Broadway, Buffalo, N. Y. Alice is only six years old. Her papa, Mr. Santmier, is blind. She is his only guide. He said the other day, (when Alice took his hand and poked his fingers in the holes in her only hat). "Never mind, my little one, the sunshine kisses your golden hair." Alice said she had one dolly once, but if she ever "grew up and could earn any money," she was going to get a big one. Maybe somebody will send Alice a dolly now, and some one else a pair of shoes, or a dress, or a hat that hasn't holes in it. She wears the Sunshine badge. The President General pinned it on her; she never goes out without it.

Write promptly to Miss Klein, if you want to start an Empty Stocking Branch.

CLAPP'S IDEAL STEEL RANGE

IS CLAPP'S IDEAL STEEL RANGE ALL I CLAIM?

The saving in fuel with Clapp's Ideal Steel Range is remarkable. It is a marvel to people not accustomed to range like the Ideal. A saving of from 25 to 50 per cent. in fuel is positively guaranteed or money refunded.

"Certainly Range Perfection."

I think more and more of Clapp's Ideal Steel Range the longer I use it. It is certainly range perfection. I am glad that I purchased it. It bakes so nicely and with such a small amount of fuel and trouble. MRS. J. W. DUDLESTON, St. Louis, Mo.

"Baking Qualities are Excellent."

We like Clapp's Ideal Steel Range in every respect. It is handsome in appearance, takes the least fuel of any other range we ever owned, and its baking qualities are excellent. ALFRED B. CHERRIER, Cavendish, Vt.

"Prettiest Range in the Neighborhood."

I must say that we are more than pleased with Clapp's Ideal Steel Range. I have found it satisfactory in every respect. I can proudly say that I have the prettiest range in the neighborhood. It is quite an ornament in the kitchen. I thank you for your kindness in shipping so promptly. MRS. M. R. MIDDLEY, Galion, Ohio.

"Would Not Take $80.00 and Have It Taken Out."

Clapp's Ideal Range is certainly a fine range. I would not take $80.00 and have it taken out of my kitchen. I am ready to speak a kind word for the Ideal at all times. MRS. M. E. LITTON, Wardell, Ark.

"Fully Meets Our Expectations."

Without making any extravagant assertions, I will say that Clapp's Ideal Steel Range fully meets our expectations. If we were to buy another range, we would certainly purchase Clapp's Ideal. J. B. FOSTER, West Ramsey, N. B.

"A Fuel Saver, Price Low."

We are satisfied that the Ideal Steel Range is all you claim it. It is quite a fuel saver. One of our neighbors bought a range and she acknowledges the $40 Ideal, which we bought you to be superior. I wish you success. REV. W. J. MILLS, Zanesville, Ohio.

THE NEW COVENANT*

A Law Written in the Heart Ensuring Spiritual Development

HOW best to lead a child to hate sin and strive after holiness, is a problem that perplexes every Christian father. He is not content with obedience. He knows that the time will come when the child must leave the home, and go out into the world, and will meet temptation and be liable to fall. The child may have obeyed the rules of the household, may be able to say, like the elder brother in the parable, "Neither transgressed I thy commands at any time," and yet the father may have no sense of security that the boy, emancipated from his control, will continue to do right. True, he will have the help that comes from habit, and that is a strong force to have enlisted on the right side. But it is not enough. We know by sad experience, that the very novelty of a temptation may be an element of its strength; that the very restraint that has been exercised may have so chafed the boy's spirit, that he will use his liberty to do the things he was prevented doing in his childhood. Neither law, nor restraint, nor habit, useful as all are, are sufficient to ensure a blameless life, much more an active Christian life. Something more is needed to arm the boy for the conflict with his own propensities and with the temptations that will assail him.

Grown men have the same need. One of the most eminent philosophers of our time declared that if some arrangement could be made, by which he could be wound up every day like a clock, so that he should always think right and do right, he would willingly accept it and give up his freedom. Our own experience tends to inspire the same attitude. The conduct of the evening coming up for review the next morning, often gives us a sense of regret and sometimes of shame. Resolutions are made that never again will we do those things, but the next evening finds our resolve weaker and our conduct as culpable. It is a sad condition, and there are two ways of dealing with it. One, which is ignoble, is to cease struggling against the evil and drift with the tide; the other is to continue the effort, hoping for eventual success. To the man who chooses the latter alternative, God offers a covenant. It is not the boon desired by the philosopher of becoming a machine, but something far better. All God's dealings with our race show that his wish for us is not that we should become automata, mere mechanical creatures restrained from the possibility of falling; but men who, while liable to fall, choose the right and follow it. But he "remembers our frame" and knows our weakness, and therefore offers his help. Those who will accept his aid receive new strength to resist evil. He does not relieve them of the conflict, but he arms them with weapons which the powers of evil have cause to dread. These the man himself must use, and if he is sincere he will conquer.

Thus the new covenant is a law of liberty. The restraint of the law of Sinai is no longer required, because all that it was devised to do, is fulfilled without it. The man who is in the new covenant has no desire to do the things prohibited. The covenant is in the nature of an agreement, by which God undertakes to give us right aspirations, good desires, holy purposes and unlimited power, if we, on our part, place full confidence in him and make use of the power placed within our reach. The familiar illustration of the man who prays to be taken to the top of the mountain applies to the whole Christian course, God will not grant him his prayer, but he will give him strength to climb. He does not receive the graces of the spirit as he would receive the gift of a suit of clothes. Every grace is the result of effort, every step costs endeavor; but it is a delightful course, for now the struggler is assured of success. The old discouragement of repeated failure is taken away, and every step is made easier by past attainment. The law written in his heart is a law of growth which leads on to perfection.

THE "CHILD OF THE FO'CASTLE"

LAST week, Dr. Delany, of the Catherine Mission and Day Nursery, called at this office to let her friends know how nicely "Little Fifteen Thousand" is getting along. "He talks about THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home every day," she said. "He had such a happy time there!"

"Little Fifteen Thousand," who wears this big name because he was the fifteen thousandth child of the poor given a happy holiday at Mont-Lawn, has another title—"Child of the Fo'castle." He was born in Honolulu; his mother died there; his father, asailor, plying his calling, came to this country bringing the baby; Joe played around in the fo'castle, the rough sailors sharing their best with him; his father spent every spare moment tending him and making and mending little garments—sailors are handy with the needle; he fashioned the overalls Joe wears in our picture. When he reached New York, the sister, with whom he had hoped to place his child, had disappeared. In the poor quarters his poverty permitted, or with whomsoever he could, he left Joe daily, for his work, returning each night, rejoicing to see the little face again. Dr. Delany reported the case, asking that Joe, who was drooping, be sent to Mont-Lawn. Our Fresh Air missionary found him in a miserable restaurant, opposite a drunken woman bawling a street song; the person with whom he had been left in charge had dropped him there. He was taken to Nyack by train; he noted with childish pleasure the trees and grass and flowers along the way. Suddenly, his face grew grave; he saw a cemetery. "My mamma," he whispered, "under the rock." Feeling the missionary's caressing clasp, he looked up wistfully. "You my mamma come back?" he murmured, and slipped his arms around her neck. He was very happy at Mont-Lawn. Everybody loved the motherless baby—his tongue still lisped. The evil he had seen had left no impression on the pure page of his childish life—save this: he sang strange songs for baby-lips, songs of the street, ballads that had floated through barroom doors to his ears. He loved to sing, and these were the only songs he knew. Our chapel service was a revelation to him; our children's gospel songs enraptured him and his own little voice chimed in.

The good news is that he and his father are now regular attendants at the Catherine Mission, and Joe almost lives in the Day Nursery. Better employment has been secured for the father, and, through the kindness shown his boy, he feels that Christians are his true friends. "A little child shall lead them." Many a redeemed life is the fruit of our children's service at Mont-Lawn. What an army of salvation these more than fifteen thousand waifs make returning to their tenement homes with prayer and song upon their lips!

There are to-day in every crowded, squalid, rum-cursed tenement section of this city children singing hymns and saying prayers and Bible verses learned at Mont-Lawn. The little chapel has seen its best days; with all our pains in repairing, it cannot last much longer; it is totally inadequate to the number of children wanting to crowd into it each summer as our work grows; last season companies had to be led away from the door after the house was filled. This letter was recently received: "We send $10 towards building a Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn.—Mr. and Mrs. B. Lancaster, N.Y." Who else will help build a temple for the children? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who have so generously co-operated with us in the good work at Mont-Lawn, will not let our children lack a house of worship.

MY LORD AND I

I HAVE a friend so precious,
So very dear to me,
He loves me with such tender love,
He loves so faithfully;
I could not live apart from him,
I love to feel him nigh,
And so we dwell together,
My Lord and I.

Sometimes I'm faint and weary,
He knows that I am weak,
And as he bids me lean on him,
His help I gladly seek;
He leads me in the paths of light,
Beneath a sunny sky,
And so we walk together,
My Lord and I.

I tell him all my sorrows,
I tell him all my joys,
I tell him all that pleases me,
I tell him what annoys;
He tells me what I ought to do,
He tells me how to try,
And so we walk together,
My Lord and I.

He knows that I am longing
Some weary soul to win,
And so he bids me go and speak
The loving word for him;
He bids me tell his wondrous love,
And why he came to die,
And so we work together,
My Lord and I.

NO DRUGS.

Just Proper Food and Rest.

The regular user of drugs to relieve pain is on the wrong track. Find the cause and remedy it by proper food and quit drugs for temporary relief or you will never get well.

A minister's wife writes:—"Three years ago, while living at Rochester, N. Y., where my husband was pastor of one of the city churches, I was greatly reduced from nervous prostration and anaemia and was compelled to go to a well-known Eastern sanitarium for my health. My stomach was in bad shape from badly selected food; I was an habitual user of Carbonate of Magnesia and my physicians made every endeavor to break up this most damaging habit, but all to no purpose.

At the sanitarium I was given Grape-Nuts and learned the value of the food. I used it continuously, eating it at nearly every meal and my recovery was rapid. Its use enabled me to eat and digest food and to give up the drug habit and I am now completely restored to good health.

At the present time I am able to attend to my household and family duties, pursue music which was formerly my profession, besides reading and studying, all of which I was totally unable to do at the time referred to." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

Cost No More than Plain Ones in

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and repair, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot corrode with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not invest in it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred white monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers avowed White Bronze preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $100 to $1,000, and a great many for free designs and information. THE LEADER'S FAREWELL

Joshua's Appeal and Closing Testimony

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHAT a testimony Joshua gave in his parting address to his people (Joshua 24), to the faithfulness of God! And yet how many there are who look upon God's promises as much more uncertain than man's, and much less to be depended upon than their own plans and efforts! Why is this? Because they have not searched the Scriptures to see what a God they have, and learned to depend upon him by putting his word to the test. This Joshua had done, and therefore could he bear this testimony. But there is another side, and Joshua did not fail to insist upon it. There are children of God who appropriate the promises while disregarding both the commandments and the warnings of God: and then wonder that his Word does not come to pass; and end by speaking evil of their God. Joshua said, "And it shall come to pass that as all the good things are come upon you of which the Lord your God spake unto you, so shall the Lord bring upon you all the evil things, until he have destroyed you from off this good land which the Lord your God hath given you." The same faithfulness which makes him keep his promise to those who trust and obey, brings him to make good his warnings to the disobedient; to fail in either would be equally untrue to himself. A child whose parent threatens punishment for disobedience, and then fails to carry it out, loses trust in that parent's word when he makes a promise; and thus want of confidence springs up between parent and child. Those children love their parents best who have found them invariably true to their word, whatever they may have said.

It was about twenty-four years since Moses had gathered the tribes of Israel together to that solemn convocation, when he had spoken to them, read them the law, taught them the song, and blessed the tribes before he went up into the mountain to die. And now Joshua was about to follow him, and it was a solemn day for the people of Israel whom he had led to victory. All the rulers of Israel were present, and they presented themselves before God. And Joshua gave them a short epitome of their national history, bringing out as it did the dealings of God with them as a people. He showed them how in their origin they were no better than other people.

Let us take the leading passages of our own lives, and quietly listen to our God as he tells us how he chose us in Christ (Eph. 1:4), how he brought us into being, how he brought us to the knowledge of the sins and the false gods of our past life, how he made known to us his salvation, how in stage after stage of our life, he delivered us from the world, the flesh, and the devil; and we shall be confounded when we discover how such grace has been shown to those who are so unworthy: all you have is the undeserved gift of God. "Now, therefore," as God has thus dealt well with you, deal ye well with him: "Fear the Lord and serve him in sincerity and truth; and put away the gods which your fathers served." There must have been among the people some remaining traces of idolatry, liable to break forth and contaminate the whole congregation.

Joshua is very definite: he brings the people up to a point of definite decision: "If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve," whether your fathers' gods or the gods of the Amorites. Be open, declare yourselves, take up your position, "but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." There are times, solemn times, and especially when the pillar of a church or family is removed, when God gives us a solemn call to enter into judgment with ourselves, and look to it how we stand with God; whether really we are fully serving him, whether indeed we are filled with the spirit; whether there remain in us any traces of that which grieves God, and hinders his testimony, in our own lives, or upon our lips. It was such a moment in Israel when their great leader was about to be taken from them.

SPECIAL NOTICE

In future, only one question will be submitted each week, in order that a larger space may be devoted to a full discussion of that question. We publish herewith a list of questions to be answered on the respective dates.

Answered in Issue of Oct. 29

What is the great public lesson to be learned from the Pennsylvania coal strike?

To be Answered in Issue of Nov. 12

How can I have the absolute inward assurance that my sins are forgiven? How is the assurance of forgiveness communicated to the individual soul?

To be Answered in Issue of Nov. 19

Is a cook, butler, manager, or other employee, who is fairly paid for his services, justified in accepting gifts from tradesmen with whom he deals, though these may not be given as "commissions"?

To be Answered in Issue of Nov. 26

In a case where the father and mother belong to different religious denominations, which of the two shall decide the denomination of the children?

To be Answered in Issue of Dec. 10

Are there any serious objections to legalized compulsory arbitration as a means of settling labor disputes, and thereby averting strikes and lockouts?

To be Answered in Issue of Dec. 24

How far would a young man be justified in taking part in the diversions of society, in order to meet influential men and women and so to advance his own social and business standing?

To be Answered in Issue of Dec. 31

Should the intellect be the master or the servant of the emotions?

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. D. S. C., Goshen, Ind. Why does our government allow fish to be hooked and smothered? Why not smother other animals? Is it not torture? Are not animals thus treated unfit for food?

Unquestionably our present methods of dealing with the lower animals are often cruel and brutal, as any one who watches the work in a fishing boat or an abattoir will admit. Yet we cannot see how Congress or the State authorities can do more than they have already done for their protection. Individual education on humane lines must do the rest.

Laura S. M., Southington, Conn. My friend declares that if a man play cards on Sunday, simply to pass away the time, and not feel the prick of his conscience, he is sinning no more than those who play the piano, read stories, walk and talk with friends, etc., for the same reason and on the same day.

Your friend has a very accommodating conscience, indeed. If he were in mid-Africa, with no opportunity to get Gospel light, he might be excused for holding such views, as he would know nothing different, but here in this civilized Christian land, with the clear light of Gospel truth shining on every side, and with the innumerable examples of the evil results of card playing and all its associations, it is an indefensible position for an intelligent man to take.

A. H. C., Middletown, Cal. Who are the sheep "not of the fold" to whom Jesus referred (John 10: 16) as those he must bring?

People among the Gentiles, who were his sheep in the sense of having his spirit. There is no way of accounting for the rapid spread of Christianity among the Gentiles under the ministry of Paul and his helpers, except on the supposition that there were many who were prepared to receive Christ, having already a longing for righteousness, living as high a life as was possible to them without the light which Jesus brought.

L. S. M., Buffalo, N. Y. Have the teachings of the Higher Critics, that some of the books of the Bible were not written by the men whose names they bear, undermined the authority of the Book?

As the authority of the Bible must be based on inspiration, the question of authorship is not so crucial as some people appear to believe. It does not signify whether two or more men wrote the book of Isaiah, as the Higher Critics contend, or whether it is the work of only one man, as the Conservatives contend; provided the message it contains came from God, as Christians of both schools believe. The Bible justifies itself by our experience. We know in our hearts that it is true, even if we found we were mistaken as place of veneration and worship. As Jerusalem is sacred to Christians and Jews, so is Rome to the Catholics, Allahabad to the Indian Mohammedans, Benares to the Hindoos, Mecca, Medina and Damascus to the Mohammedans generally, and Moscow and Kiev to the Russians. So, too, was Cuzco to the ancient Incas.

A. D. E., Thelma, Tex. Is there any record showing what became of Lazarus, or of the son of the widow of Nain, after they were resurrected?

There is no authentic record. According to an old tradition, mentioned in Epiphanius, Lazarus, who was thirty years old when he was restored to life, lived thirty years afterward. One account was to the effect that, with Mary and Martha, he traveled to Provence in France, and preached the Gospel in Marseilles. Nothing further is mentioned concerning the subject of the resurrection at Nain.

Reader, Vineland, N. J. What is the reason stated by the Nebraska courts for excluding the Bible from the public schools in that State?

Judge Letton, of the Gage County District Court, in 1899, denied the application for a writ to prohibit the reading of the Bible and the singing of such hymns as "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," "Nearer, my God, to Thee," "When He Cometh," etc., in the public schools. A teacher (Miss Edith Beecher), in that county, was accustomed to reading a portion of Scripture daily, and having the pupils sing a "Gospel Hymn." Judge Letton being the day established by custom. The President's proclamation is followed by that of the various governors, who alone have power to declare a holiday in their respective States. It is not a legal holiday by federal law—even the Fourth of July is not that—but by legislative enactment it is a legal holiday in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North and South Carolina, North and South Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia and West Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. 4. It is a goodly and toothsome fowl, fit to be king of the feast; besides there is precedent to guide: Governor Bradford, who ordered that first Thanksgiving, specified: "Beside water fowle, there is great store of wild turkeys;" and four men were sent out fowling for the colonial feast.

Mrs. John W., Denver, Col. Do you think Mars, Venus, and Mercury are inhabited? The Bible doesn't tell us so. When God made this world he made the sun, moon, and stars. We don't read in the Bible that he made any other worlds but this.

All is conjecture and speculation concerning the population of the stars. Scientists tell us that certain stars or planets seem to have atmospheric and other conditions favorable to animal and vegetable life.

Coal strike conditions in the Northern and Middle States, contrast strongly with this bright, sunny letter from Windsor, Fla.:

My heart is stirred to write you of our beautiful Southland of sunshine, where the birds sing, and flowers bloom every month in the year. I call it "Beulah Land." We shall never have to pay $21 per ton for coal, for we burn the pine wood, which costs very little. Houses can be rented cheap. Rooms furnished or unfurnished can also be rented at small cost. People can save the expense of the trip here in fuel alone. Our lovely town, the streets lined with oaks, is an ideal place for winter and summer homes.

My heart longs for the people to come and enjoy a winter out-of-doors, where snow and ice never come.

J. R. No, the greatest need, in the editor's opinion, is for a good, clear, legible style of penmanship, so that he may be able to read at a glance the handwriting of his correspondents, and not be compelled to guess at the one-half of what they mean, and totally miss the other half because it is unreadable. Doubtless they are on great themes and they may be running over with great thoughts, but alas! the world will never know it, because we cannot spend the time to decipher the ill-written MS.

W. P. B., Archer, Fla. Write to Rand & McNally, publishers, Chicago, for it.

J. W. R., Mosgrove, Pa. There is no such verse or passage anywhere in the Bible.

Mrs. J. H. A., Wooster, O. 1. Mrs. Eddy is still living. 2. Her doctrines are not held by any of the orthodox Christian churches.

If any church which is arranging to get a new Communion Service, wishes to help a poor, struggling Southern church by giving it the old service, the gift will be appreciated. Name and address will be furnished to those who write to Church, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, N. Y.

R. W. D., Brooklyn, N. Y. Every State, while owing allegiance to the general government, is sovereign within its own borders, in all that relates to its own people and their affairs. The system you propose would entirely abrogate State sovereignty, and put the whole country under paternal government.

Inquirer, Reading, Pa. Admiral Dewey was baptized as an adult on March 16, 1860, in his 24th year, by Rev. F. W. Shelton, rector of Christ Church, Montpelier. He was a communicant of that church for a number of years.

Mrs. S. A. Criswell, Charleston, Woodward County, Okla., writes: "We have a Union Sunday School here in a blacksmith shop, and we badly need singing books and papers." Who will help this pioneer school?

F. M. B., Paintersville, Pa., writes: I find the line, "Care killed the cat," credited to Ben Jonson, in my Cyclopaedia of Quotations. The quotation reads:

"Hang sorrow; care'll kill a cat." It is from "Every Man in His Humor."

S., New York City, writes: Are you quite right in your statement of the origin of "Care killed a cat"? I think the true origin is found in Ben Jonson, who wrote:

"Hang sorrow! Care will kill a cat," meaning that care will kill anything, even a cat, though it be said to have nine lives.

AN EARNEST APPEAL FROM DR. KLOPSCH:

LAST year I issued a personal card to our subscribers, asking them to help me to give them the very best service possible by sending in their renewals during the month of November. The response was so exceptionally gratifying that we were enabled to give the most thorough satisfaction, while the care and responsibility incident to the busiest season of the year were so agreeably distributed that I personally was relieved of much anxiety and worryment.

This year our list is much larger than ever before. We rejoice in that fact, because it gratifyingly emphasizes a wider demand for good, helpful and wholesome literature, and we are more desirous than ever to give the best service at our command. But without the same kind co-operation, we fear we could not do as well as last year.

I therefore earnestly request that our subscribers, as a personal favor, send in their renewals during the month of November. As every subscription will be renewed from the date of present expiry, no subscriber loses anything by renewing a little ahead of time, but such kind co-operation affords me great relief at a time when our mail averages about ten thousand letters a day.

The applicant, Daniel Freeman, carried the case to the Supreme Court, which reversed the finding of Judge Letton, on the ground that the exercises complained of were "sectarian, within the meaning of the Constitution." The Supreme Court opinion was signed by Commissioner Ames, Justices Sedgwick and Holcomb concurring. The opposition to the Bible reading and Gospel hymns came from two sources—the first objector being a noted freethinker, the second, an influential Catholic. Outside of these, and a few others, the taxpayers of the district were a unit in favor of the retaining of the exercises.

Social Life in Cuba

...BY...
CHARLES M.
PEPPER.

TOWER OF THE FUERZA,
HAVANA

CUBAN social customs have many delightful features. As in all Latin countries, politeness and courtesy are found. Good breeding is not limited to any one class. For Americans, there is too much restraint and too little freedom for the women. But this restraint is only the crust of custom. Gradually it will be broken through without destroying what is good.

Because of the manner in which the houses are built, home life is easily seen by the stranger. He can look through the barred windows or doors into the open courts where the family gathers. Beyond this he can see the dining-room where the table is set, and sometimes get a glimpse of the kitchen, with the charcoal braziers on which most of the cooking is done. Few Cuban houses have ovens. The bread is baked at the baker's shop, and if there is to be roast turkey or suckling pig, a great delicacy, the roasting is done outside. But all the highly-seasoned stews, ragouts and soups are made at home.

In the towns, much of the social visiting is done in the plaza or public park. Two or three evenings a week the band plays there and everybody goes for a promenade, during which visits are exchanged and the latest news or gossip told. After that the family usually drops into one of the many cafes or restaurants for light refreshments, such as ices or cooling drinks made from the native fruits or nuts.

Visiting among families and friends is not so common as in the United States, though it has been growing during the last three or four years, since the Americans have been in the island. A Cuban or a Spanish gentleman rarely invites a friend to his house to dinner, or to meet his family. Instead, he will take him to his club or to his favorite restaurant, and dine with him there.

Two meals a day is enough for most of the inhabitants of the tropics. They have no breakfast, as we understand it. In the early morning, the men will take a cup of black coffee, often without even a roll or a bite of bread. The women generally take coffee with milk and a roll. Few of them care for the American innovation of fresh fruit and eggs with the morning coffee. The laboring population, whether in the country or in the town, also starts in the day's work not long after sunrise on black coffee and sometimes coarse bread, but not often that much. Towards ten o'clock, when the rays of the sun get hottest, everybody rests for a couple of hours. They take a real midday rest. Then they partake of a substantial dinner, although they call it breakfast. Among the better classes, this meal will consist of a stew or soup, of some kind of meat, of fish, with sweet potatoes and other vegetables, and of dessert usually consisting of cheese with uava jelly. Eggs they also have at the beginning of the meal, and sometimes serve rice with it. They finish their breakfast with a good-sized cup of black coffee. Then they take their siesta, or midday sleep.

The poorer people do not have so much for breakfast; but usually they content themselves with the boniatos or sweet potatoes, with fried plantains or bananas, and with tasajo or dried beef. They also seek to supply themselves with a dish known as bacallao. This is stewed codfish. It is cooked after the Spanish style, and does not taste at all like codfish as it would be served in New England homes.

Dinner, which comes any time after five o'clock in the afternoon, is a meal much like the breakfast, but there are more dishes. It is always topped off by sweets for dessert and black coffee. Spaniards and Cubans are strangers to the pastry known as American pie. The dish which always may be found is rice, in some form. If chicken is not with it, there may be bits of ham or bacon, or sometimes shell-fish, such as mussels. The fault which an American finds is that there is no change and variety in the cooking. It becomes fearfully monotonous. Breakfast is the same all the year round, and so is dinner.

Cuban hospitality, while not lacking in the city, is better shown in the country. I never found anywhere a more kindly people. In the interior, they have no such thing as a spare bed, but the wise traveler, who knows enough to take his hammock along, will find room made for him outside and every attention paid to his comfort. An American woman, who went about through the island with her husband, told me a story of her own experience which illustrated this hospitality. Her husband fixed a hammock for her, and being used grown suddenly cool, and she had taken it from herself and children, in order that the strange lady might not suffer. Long before daylight, she heard the husband getting up and slipping away on his pony. He got back in the early morning, bringing some coffee. The little household was out of that article, and of itself would have gotten along a few days; but he had gone ten miles to the nearest village store to get some, in order that the visitor might not suffer.

In the country, where the roads are poor or where there are none, a well-to-do family will go visiting in the volante or two-wheeled family buggy, but more often the women and children ride the ponies and make long journeys in this way. They are all perfectly at home on horseback.

The itinerant band is seen in the villages and the country. Usually it has two or three horns and a guitar, but always the kettle-drum. All Cubans are fond of amusement and the serenade is one of their chief diversions. Every countryman has his guitar, and he likes to sit at the door of his cabin, with a broad-brimmed hat flapped back, so as to show his full face, while he hums a ballad which tells of the beauties of the palms, and the running water, and the enjoyment of his own humble life.

Among educated Cubans, much attention is paid to the formalities of life. When New Year's and Christmas come around, it is customary to send your card and best wishes to all your friends. Failure to do this is looked upon as a slight, and is not readily forgiven.

People of the tropics are not hard-working, as we in the North understand labor; yet they are not lazy, and they do their share of work. However, they have amusing ways of excusing their own indolence. In common life the proverbs for which the Spanish language is famous are often quoted. One of these purports to give an excuse for putting off a task. It runs: "Monday, too early; Tuesday, unlucky day; Wednesday, middle of the week; Thursday, think about it; Friday, doubtful; Saturday, next week." Thus the lazy man excuses himself. There is another Spanish saying which I have often heard in Cuba. It runs: "On Monday, embark neither on the sea of matrimony nor on other seas." And it is true that Monday marriages are rare. Cuban courtships themselves are not as open as with us, yet somehow the young people manage to make known their sentiments toward each other. With the Cuban girls it is the fans and the eyes that talk.

Superstitions, unfortunately, are common in Cuba, yet I do not know that they are more so than in the United States. Some of those which are found among the colored people are the same as those that exist among the negroes of the South. One of the most common superstitions is that of the evil eye. I have known a number of educated persons who carried charms to protect themselves

Perils of Commercial Travelers

NEHEMIAH 13: 20:

"So the sellers of all kinds of ware, lodged without Jerusalem once or twice"

PRESIDENT HARRISON once sent forth a proclamation which aroused widespread interest. In it he announced that the claims of many Indian tribes had been bought up by the Government. Therefore, by the power which was vested in him as Chief Executive of the United States, he would, on April 22, 1889, open the central portion of Oklahoma to the American people. All the men and women who at that time entered the new country could stake themselves out a claim or a lot or a farm. On the appointed day, thousands upon thousands of people assembled upon that borderland. Some sat upon fleet thoroughbreds, ready to make the race for the choicest lots in the cities which would within a few days spring up as if by magic, and the streets of which were already laid out. Some came on foot. These divested themselves of all superfluous clothing, so that they could run as swiftly as possible. When the signal was given by the pistol held in the cavalryman's hand, the great multitude broke into a run. The would-be settlers rushed ahead so fast that within a few hours the whole land was taken possession of, and cities like Guthrie began to teem with life. Oklahoma, only ten years after it was first opened to the white man, had nearly 400,000 inhabitants.

But no sooner was Oklahoma settled and the little country stores set up, than the wholesale merchants of New York, and Philadelphia, and Chicago, and St. Louis began to send into this new territory another great army of invaders made up of the representatives of their different establishments. These modern crusaders have been aptly termed in the commercial traveler's parlance, the "Knights of the Grip." Instead of riding a war charger like the knights of olden time, they rode behind an "iron horse," which is called a locomotive. Instead of carrying a spear or a shield, they carried models or pictures, showing how the steel and iron had been melted into ploughs and reapers and spades and axes and hammers and saws. Instead of having mailed armor, they had pieces of cloth, which they carried as samples of clothing, which they wanted to sell to the storekeepers for the new farmers and their wives and children. There is not a town in the United States, no matter how small it may be, or how newly established, which has escaped the weekly, if not daily, invasions of the commercial travelers.

An Ancient Peril

In the scene of my text can be found almost an exact duplication of the invasion of the newly settled regions of Oklahoma by the Knights of the Grip. No sooner did Nehemiah, the governor, return from his Babylonish exile and rebuild the walls of Jerusalem and make it a safe place in which to live, than the commercial travelers of that day began to flock towards the Davidic capital to dispose of their goods. But there was one habit about many of these ancient commercial travelers which Nehemiah did not like. Some of them would persist in arriving at the city walls on the Sabbath day, and trying to turn God's day of rest into a day of barter and gain. The governor, in order to stop the sin of Sabbath desecration, ordered that the city gates should be closed on the night before the Sabbath, and not be opened again until the morning after the Sabbath, no matter how much these ancient commercial travelers might want to get in and escape the dangers of being murdered by the robbers who nightly infested the surrounding hills. Thus we read the words of my text with a clearer interpretation, "So the sellers of all kind of ware, lodged without Jerusalem once or twice."

As we walk in and out among the sellers of Nehemiah's time, barred without the city walls, and examine their piled-up bales and hear the muttered curses of the men blaspheming because they could not enter the Jerusalem gates, and watch the preparations they are making to resist the attacks of the robbers, I am reminded of the dangers to which our modern Knights of the Grip are exposed. They, too, have lurking enemies who would despoil them, and because those enemies are more treacherous, more insidious, and more ruthless than the Bedouin hordes who menaced the ancient commercial travelers of Nehemiah's time, I am anxious to point them out and put the imperiled men on their guard.

The evil dangers threaten a commercial traveler's life when he is away from home. They try to ambush the seller of all kinds of ware when he is on the march. They strike at his heart in a time and in a place when he is apt to think he can sin with impunity, because no one will be the wiser, as he can cover up his tracks. They come to the Knights of the Grip in the insinuating and dangerous ways that evil temptations sometimes overthrow Christian people when they are traveling abroad. It is a well known fact that the average

European travelers will commit sins in Paris, or Vienna, or Rome, or Monte Carlo, or Peking, or Calcutta, that they would never dream of doing if they were at home among their own friends and neighbors. The young Dutch Queen, Wilhelmina, illustrated this common tendency of the human race to be worse away from home than they are by their own fireside, in the quaint and pointed answer which she gave to the Prince of Wales, when visiting Queen Victoria some years ago. The then heir apparent to the English throne asked her what she was most impressed by in England. "It is to find that the English people are so refined and gentle and kind and religiously devout in their own homes," she replied. "One would never have guessed it from the specimens I have seen traveling in Holland." An average man can commit as a rule twenty sins away from home, when he is traveling alone, in a railroad train, or stopping alone in a hotel, or living alone with strangers, far more easily with less risk of injury to his position and reputation than one sin when he is being watched by his employer's eyes, or when he is in daily companionship with a Christian mother, wife or child. It makes an immense amount of difference how a locomotive will act when it is on the down grade whether or no the engineer has perfect control over its powerful Westinghouse brakes. It makes an immense amount of difference with some of us when we are heading towards the open drawbridges of sin, whether or no we have our loved ones near by, who are ready to reach out their hands to help us close the throttles and apply the spiritual brakes, so that we can halt before we have gone too far and it is too late to try to stop.

Celestial Reinforcement

But though the swift moving currents of daily influences in a commercial traveler's life are apt to flow in the wrong direction when he is away from home, yet that is no valid excuse for his yielding to temptation. In the first place, God has distinctly declared that he will never allow any temptation to come nigh us which is greater than we can bear, if we will only throw ourselves upon his mercy, and plead and continue to plead for Divine strength. Mighty as are the temptations the commercial traveler meets when he is away from home, the Divine power which is at his disposal is infinitely stronger. It can triumph over every opposing force. That noble Gospel minister of Pittsburg estimated it rightly when, in inaugurating a mighty spiritual movement, the obstacles to it were pointed out by two Christian friends. "Brethren," said good, old Dr. Riddle, "this is God's work, not ours. You two men seem to think that there are only three of us to start in this movement. Mr. So and So, you are one cipher in God's hands. Our brother here is another cipher. I am another cipher. That makes three ciphers. God is at least one. Therefore, if we place our three ciphers on the right side of God's numeral, we shall have in the beginning the strength of a thousand men with which to start in this work." The commercial traveler starting on one of his trips may consider himself only a cipher in the conflict, but if he will ask and plead for Divine help to meet the temptations of the road, his own human powers for the resisting of temptation will be infinitely increased and multiplied. They will be sufficient to overcome every temptation, even though his Christian father and mother, and wife and children may be absent from his side.

But there is still another reason why the commercial traveler should not yield to the temptations which he meets away from home. The modern Knight of the Grip is naturally a stronger man, mentally, morally and physically, than the average man who is compelled to stay at home and work. It takes brains, and lots of brains, to be able to sell goods away from home. The time is past when the great merchants think that any drunken, gambling, blaspheming employee is good enough to go upon the road. The employers to-day demand that their commercial travelers be men of character, of brain, men with the moral stamina to say yes and no. And young man, the mere fact that you are a commercial traveler is proof positive that you have character enough, by the Grace of God, to be able to resist any temptation which you may meet in your travels.

Service of Picked Men

That strong men are naturally selected for the difficult positions in life, was well illustrated by an incident which James Reynolds, the great Sunday School secretary, once told me in reference to the late Civil War. As chaplain in the Northern army, he was one Sabbath day preaching to the soldiers of his regiment. The service was being conducted out of doors. The soldiers were sitting upon a hillside near the camp, while he stood at the foot of the hill. In the midst of the sermon, the colonel came to his side and said, "Chaplain, I would like to interrupt the meeting a moment." Then he called the names of about a dozen men and ordered them to go to his tent at once. After the benediction, Mr. Reynolds asked the colonel why he selected these twelve men, and why he did not select any other twelve who happened to be near his tent. "Because, Chaplain," answered the colonel, "I want the bravest and in my regiment. I am going to send those men out on a very important mission. Perhaps they will never come back, because the dangers they will have to face are very great. The safety of this whole army may depend upon their faithfulness in their work." So, the mercantile world, the business men select their most trustworthy employees for the most difficult places. And as there are no tasks more difficult than those which confront the commercial traveler, the best men are naturally detailed for the road. Therefore, my brother, it is no excuse for you to say your temptations are greater than the average man's. You are naturally stronger than the average man. By the help of God you can and ought to be able to overcome these temptations. The reason you have been selected for the duties of a commercial traveler is because you have a keen mind and a better moral ballast than the average clerk who was working by your side in the store.

Temptations assail the commercial traveler all when he is buoyed up with great success and when he is discouraged by great financial depression; when he is thrown off his guard by exultation or disheartened by a long succession of bitter disappointments. Many commercial travelers do not receive a regular guaranteed salary. They work on a system of commissions. The more goods they sell, the more money they receive. The less goods they dispose of, the less income they have. The average commercial traveler's income is apt to ebb and flow like the tides. In one town, the Knight of the Grip may sell thousands of dollars worth of goods. In every store he enters he finds a large purchaser. In another town, he may not even meet a purchaser. Then, when the average commercial traveler has what he calls a "run of luck," he is apt to be unduly elated, and that elation is often the means Satan uses to trip him up, and hurl him over the precipice of sin. Or, he has what is called a run of bad luck. He may go on, week after week, and find that a rival, who represents a firm carrying the same line of goods, may have preceded him and swept his district clean. That discouragement may also be the means of driving him in the quicksands of sin. The imminent danger of exultation and disappointment are the Charybdis and Scylla which every commercial traveler has to face.

Imaginary Speculation

Now, my friend, you who spend most of your life selling goods upon the road, I want to warn you again of the dangers which come from either exultation or discouragement. Henry Ward Beecher cured one of his parishioners of the temptation of entering into Wall Street speculations by an experiment. The pastor of Plymouth Church asked his friend never to gamble with stocks for at least three years. During those three years, Mr. Beecher wanted him to make a study of the stock market. Every time he thought stocks were going up, he was to make a memorandum of the same and decide how much he wanted to buy. And every time he thought he ought to sell stocks to make a memorandum of the same. Then, at the end of three years Mr. Beecher said: "Count up your results and find out where you would have stood if these purchases and sales had actually been made." This the parishioner did, as Mr. Beecher desired. At the end of three years he found out that if he had entered Wall street and speculated as he wished to do, he would have been bankrupted ten times over. You, my commercial friend, may learn the same lesson. You do not have to experiment yourself, but you may see in the lives of other commercial travelers the results of allowing either exultation or despondency to overcome you. Recall the history of those commercial travelers whom you have known for the last five or ten years. I want you to try to remember all the drinkers and carousers who started out with you upon the road. Almost without exception, you know they have lost their positions and are living in comparative poverty, or are lying in drunkards' graves. Now, my friend, dare you, as an intelligent man, have run any such risks? Dare you, in any circumstances, drink or dissipate, no matter how intense may be your disappointments or how exultant your joy? Dangers threaten a modern commercial traveler

Perils of Commercial Travelers

life because his mind is often beclouded on account of physical debilitation. To be a really successful commercial traveler, a young man ought to have a physical constitution of iron. He ought to have the same kind of bone, and muscle, and sinew which made the knights of old famous. He ought to be able to digest any kind of food, sleep in hard or soft beds, sleep on a hall lounge or in a chair, or lying upon the bare wooden seat of the caboose of a freight train. He ought to be able to walk along a dark country road at midnight in midwinter, to catch the one o'clock train for the next town. He ought to be able to assimilate irregular meals, and have his nightly rest broken up once or twice, and sometimes even thrice, by the changing of cars, and yet be cheerful and happy and sell his goods just the same during the day. Alas, I well know what are the physical difficulties of a traveler's life. For many years I have, off and on, traveled around the country as a lecturer. I have had to suffer all these trials, and have met and talked with the Knights of the Grip, in many a lonely station in the midnight hour, while waiting for a belated railroad connection.

Perils of Physical Depletion

But even under the very brightest of conditions, and even though a man's backbone may seem to be made of steel, nature will assert itself. A commercial traveler must always pay the price, and have his physical frame ebel at the hardships which it has been made to suffer. And so during those times of physical exhaustion, a commercial traveler on account of the physical becloudment of his mind, is often apt to take a depressed view of life. He is apt to often lose his faith in God and in his fellow-men, and to feel that his own life is not worth the living, and that he is but of little use to his fellow-man. My brother, I want you, if you are a commercial raveler and a stranger, who have just by chance dropped nto this church, to know and feel that your life is worth living. God does love you. Your dear ones are dependent upon you. It is of infinite importance whether you do right or wrong. You must not let your belief in God falter, when you need a physician and a dose of medicine and a good rest. You must not let the hand of Satan touch you and lead you into the paths of sin when your head aches and your digestive organs refuse to do their proper work. One of the greatest generals of the ages was defeated in battle and driven into exile, because, the night before the battle opened, he was writhing in physical torture, produced by a sudden and violent attack of dyspepsia. Many a commercial raveler has been defeated in life's spiritual battle, because his health has become undermined and under- oned. Oh, ye Knights of the Grip, be very careful of your physical health, for your spiritual happiness and faithfulness may be destroyed through your physical lebilities.

Dangers threaten a modern commercial traveler also unless he rigidly fulfils his religious duties and spiri- ally employs himself on the Lord's day. It is very asy when Sabbath morning comes, in a little town where the commercial traveler has to spend Sunday, for im to say to himself, "Well, I guess I will not go to hurch to-day. I think I will stay in my room and read he morning newspaper, or write some letters." It is very eductive after a hard week's work for the commercial raveler to go to bed Saturday night, with the intention of staying there until half-past ten o'clock the next morning, and then, in order to save time, to break the Lord's day and take the Sunday train for the next own. Or, if a commercial traveler is spending Sunday n a large city, it is very easy for him to go and hear he different popular preachers in the same way that, out of curiosity, he might go and see the great trage- dians act the part of a "Hamlet," or "Othello," a "Rich- elieu," or a "Dr. Jeykell" and a "Mr. Hyde."

Though all those attractions may be very fascinat- ing, yet, my friend, you must remember that the true worship of God does not consist in the mere satisfying of our intellectual curiosity, or in lying in bed on the Sabbath day, but in work, hard, conscientious work for the Master. The old adage tells us that, "Satan has to hunt the busy man, but the indolent man hunts the devil." Therefore, my brother, the easiest way to over- come the temptations which beset the commercial trav- eler during the long, lonely hours of the Sabbath day, is to worship God while away from home in the same way you would, or rather ought to do, if you were at home. Go to the little village meeting-house, bright and early, and offer your services to the Sunday School superintendent, and say that you will take a class for the day, if any teacher is absent. Go to the Young People's meeting at night, and offer there your most- earnest prayer, and give them the most, practical, help- ful talk you can. After the morning or evening ser- mon, go to the pulpit and take the country or the city minister by the hand, and tell him that you intend to pray for him and his work during the whole week. If you will do all this regularly and systematically, every Sabbath day, you will find, oh commercial traveler, that you have not only been a messenger to help others, but that you have deepened your own spiritual life. By such an evangelistic mission as this, you will not only, by Divine Grace, overcome the sins peculiar to the Sab- bath, but also the besetting sins which every week day lurk along the wayside of every commercial traveler's journey.

The worst dangers of a modern commercial travel- er's life generally assail him when he is comparatively a young man. Once in a while, you may find an old man who still travels upon the road; but, as a rule, the commercial travelers are comparatively young men. The life is so hard, an older man can rarely stand the physical strain. Unless protected and restrained by the Grace of God, these young men are apt to fall into the traps of sin impulsively. They are apt to say to themselves, "Well, I know I ought not to sin, but I am young yet. Therefore, I can afford to sow a few wild oats, and then I can repent and at last live to a respect- able middle age, and even be honored in my old age."

Benedict Arnold's Shame

This expectation, my young friend, might be all right, if it were true. But, as a rule, it is not true. Generally, a sinful young age means a sinful middle age. A sinful middle age means a sinful old age, if the human body is not destroyed by sin before the three- score years have been lived out. The sins of youth will generally follow a man and curse his whole after life, as the sins of Benedict Arnold's youth cursed him to the grave. Talleyrand, the great French statesman, gave a dramatic account of the desolation of the traitor. When he was exiled by the order of Napoleon, and had to leave France, he intended to sail for America. Coming to the little French seaport town where he was about to embark, he heard that an American gentleman was living in the hotel. So he sent up a card and asked for an interview. Talleyrand was ushered into a dark room, where this American gentleman sat. Then Talleyrand said: "Sir, I have been exiled from France, and expect to cross the sea and live in America. I hear that you are an American gentleman. Therefore I craved an interview to ask you to give me a few letters of introduction to some of your friends in New York City." With that, the gentleman laughed a horrible laugh. As he retreated towards the door, he said: "No, Mr. Talleyrand, I cannot give you any letters to my friends in America. The reason is that I have no friends in America. I am the only man to-day who was born in America, and who has shed his blood for freedom, who has not one friend in all America. My name, sir, is Benedict Arnold. I am Major General Arnold, of His Majesty's Service. I am Benedict Arnold, the traitor." As Benedict Arnold's youthful sin followed him to his grave, so the sin into which the youthful commercial traveler falls follows him to the grave. Oh, my young friends who spend most of your life upon the road, I beg of you to seek Divine help and pray, and continue to pray, that you may overcome the daily temptations of the commercial traveler's life.

A Talk in a Railroad Car

I would plead with each one of you to consecrate yourself to the Divine Master's service, so that you may overcome the besetting sins of a life away from home. You are not at heart a bad man. You have many tender ties which ought to bind you to a life of purity and truth. In all probability, you have the same kind of home ties as had the commercial traveler I once met upon the road. It was during a long, tiresome journey. Towards the evening hour, as it gradually began to darken, I closed my book and began to think about the mother of my children, and the little babies at home. I said to myself: "Yes, the little white night-gowns are now about to be put on. Yes, they must be saying their prayers about now. Yes, I can almost hear them say—'God bless Papa and Mamma!'" Then, looking across the aisle, I saw a young man about my own age open his satchel. He took out of that satchel a little paper package. He began to unfasten the cord. Then he exposed to view three or four photographs, and be- gan to look long and earnestly at them. I crossed the aisle. Putting my hand upon the young man's shoulder, I said: "Well, old fellow, I have a wife and some babies, too." "Have you?" he answered, as his face lighted up with a smile. "Would you like to see mine?" Then we talked about home. Then his eyes became moist, when he laughingly and yet pathetically said: "Let me show you a letter I received this morning from my baby." He held up an old crumpled brown piece of paper, over which a little child's chubby finger had scrawled a lot of hieroglyphics, which writing looked like a lot of hen-tracks in a barn-yard. Then I turned and said: "You ought to be a good man with such a family of little ones." "Yes," he answered, "I know I should. And do you know, I feel that if it was not for my lovely, consecrated home, and my wife's prayers, and the thought that my little children are every night pray- ing for me, I might yield to the many temptations of a commercial traveler's life. But every time I start to do wrong, my little children's arms seem to cling about my neck as they cry: 'Don't, papa. For your dear little babies' sake, don't sin.'" And so in that evening hour as the train was speeding towards my destination for lecturing, I felt as I feel now. I felt that though the average commercial traveler has many sins besetting him, yet he is armored and helmeted from the attacks of temptations by his absent loved ones' prayers. The average commercial traveler ought to be true to his Gospel faith, when God has given to him a lovely, con- secrated Christian home. Oh, ye Knights of the Grip, will you be true to the Christ who is pleading with you to-day, to bow at his feet. Will ye be true to Jesus, on account of the prayers of your loved ones, even if your conscience tells you that no prayer is so appropriate for you as that of the publican, which you can utter in your own behalf?

"The Whole World is Queer" QUAIN PSALMS FOR QUEER FOLK ...By... Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM XIII.
The Psalm of Sorrow

1. How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord? or ever? how long wilt thou hide thy face from me?
2. How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily?

SORROW UNTO DEATH

Here is sorrow even unto death. If it were beyond death, there would be despair; but there is no sorrow in heaven. People cannot die when they want to; if they could, there would be many dead this hour.

"Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and unanswered prayer, told of in this Psalm, is worse than hope deferred. There is but one thing for the soul in sorrow to do—trust in God. The song will come as in the end of the Psalm.

PSALM XIV.
The Fool's Psalm

1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.

It is bad enough to be a fool at heart, but when the lips join in, the case is sorrowfully sad.

PLAYING THE FOOL

This Psalm should be read with James 3—the "Tongue Chapter" of the Bible—and after that, the first nine chapters of Proverbs, "the Book of Wisdom."

Queer, how often good people play the fool, to their own sorrow and hurt—and hurt of other folk, too! The wise man ever says in his heart and by his lip, "There is a God, and I will serve him."

PSALM XV.
The Christian's Psalm

1. Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?
2. He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart.

THE CHRISTIAN PILGRIM

This Psalm furnishes a photograph of a genuine Christian—one who "abides in the Tabernacle of God, and will dwell in his holy hill."

Queer folk they whose word of lip and work of life are distinctly different. Saying, "Lord, Lord," does not get one through the Gates of Pearl.

Thistles bear no grapes, and thorns yield no figs, in this world or any other.

PSALM XVI.
The Psalm of Victory

8. I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.
10. For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

"I SHALL NOT BE MOVED"

Here is where captivity is led captive by prophecy. It is the first sounding-note of the Resurrection trumpet.

Easter morning looms up and the lilies begin to burst forth. The wail of crucifixion is drowned by the song of victory.

Sad soul, afraid of death, and all the sorrows before it, put your trust in God, and you can sing of "fullness of joy and pleasures for evermore."

The First Presbyterian Church of Newtown, N. Y., Celebrates its 250th Anniversary — A Remarkable Record of Pioneer Christian Work

AMONG the notable events of the present year there are few that possess a wider historic or religious significance than that which has just taken place at Newtown, Long Island, N. Y., where the First Presbyterian Church, during the week from October 26 to November 2, celebrated its two-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary. This venerable church has a remarkable history.

In the year 1652, a little band of English immigrants—fifty-five in all—came from New England to Long Island. This was just thirty-two years after the landing of the Puritans at Plymouth and twenty-nine years after the settlement of Manhattan Island by the Dutch. The newcomers bought some 1,376 acres of land from the Indians, cleared forests, built houses, tilled fields, and called their settlement by the name of Middleburg. Their little cluster of dwellings was located upon the street where now stands the Presbyterian church in the village of Newtown.

These men, like the other early settlers in that section, were dissenters in religious principles, and were chiefly Presbyterians, though there were probably a few Independents or Congregationalists. They were stern in morals, upright in walk and conversation, and ardent advocates of liberty and freedom of conscience. One of the buildings which they erected served both as a church and a ministerial residence, the first incumbent being the Rev. John Moore, himself one of the settlers. From this small body of worshipers grew a church which has weathered the storms and the vicissitudes of two and a half centuries, and which is to-day strong and influential, in a spiritual and material sense. It has been used, during these long generations of Christian effort, as a means of grace to multitudes.

On December 13, 1670, the people voted to erect "a new meeting-house," and twenty-four years later, in 1694, the church building was again enlarged. Meanwhile, the settlers had a varied experience. Indian outrages and depredations kept them constantly vigilant. Those were days of prayer and vigilance, such as the Puritans of Plymouth have left us some record of—days when men went to church with the Bible in one hand, the rifle in the other.

Their beloved first pastor died in 1657, and for a time Richard Mills, the colony school-master, officiated in his place. In 1662, the Rev. Wm. Leverich was engaged as the second regular pastor. He was the son of Sir Sabelle Leverich, an Englishman of title with estates in Warwickshire. He was a Cambridge graduate and an Episcopalian; but he voluntarily cast in his lot with the Nonconformists, coming to America with a party of the early colonists. He was the associate of Rev. John Cotton and Rev. John Eliot, and, with the latter, had much to do with the early efforts for the evangelization of the Indian tribes. Mr. Leverich was a man of learning and distinguished piety, and until his death, in 1677, led his Newtown flock like a faithful shepherd.

Revs. S. Morgan Jones, John Morse, and Robert Breck, filled the pulpit in succession from 1677 to 1708. Mr. Jones was a near relative of Colonel Jones, of Monmouthshire, England, the brother-in-law of Oliver Cromwell, "the famous Protector." In 1669, while a chaplain in South Carolina, he was captured by the Tuscarora Indians, and condemned to death; but his life was saved by a grateful sachem of the Doeg tribe, who ransomed him. He remained with the Doegs four months, teaching them the Gospel. He was the original founder of Sunday Schools, having established the first Sunday School ever known while he was pastor in Newtown. This was nearly a century before Robert Raikes founded his Sunday School in Gloucester, England.

After 1708, for a number of years, the church, at intervals, was without a regular pastor, owing to colonial troubles, the French raids on the frontier, and the in-

In 1708, the Rev. Samuel Pumry, a divine noted for both learning and piety, assumed the regular pastorate. Under his direction the church made a still further advance. It was received into the Presbytery of Philadelphia. It began a new and commodious building in 1715, which, however, was not completed until 1741. It was adorned with a spire, containing a small bell. During the Revolutionary War, when Newtown was in the hands of the British, a party of rampant Tories, to show their contempt for "dissenters," as they termed the Presbyterians, climbed upon the church roof at night and sawed off the steeple, pulling it down with a rope. Afterward, the British used the desecrated building as a prison and guard-house, and finally demolished it.

Previous to the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, the Revs. George McNish, Simon Horton, and Andrew Bay, successively filled the Newtown pulpit. Under Horton's preaching, a revival took place, and many souls were added to the church. It is said that during his pastorate, the celebrated George Whitefield once preached in the church, while visiting Newtown.

From 1776 to 1783, the church underwent great hardships, owing to the disturbed condition of the country (a large part of Long Island being then a British military camp). The congregation was scattered like chaff, and not a few were imprisoned "for conscience sake." Revs. James Lyon, Peter Fish and Elihu Palmer were among the stated supplies during this tempestuous period. Mr. Fish was widely known as a young convert of Whitefield, under whose preaching he had been led to Christ when only thirteen years of age. After the war, the flock gathered again, and took courage, but it was not until 1790 that they were able to call a pastor, although they had several preachers as supplies, meanwhile. When the new building, so long delayed in construction, was finally completed in 1791, the Rev. Dr. Rogers, of New York, preached the dedication sermon. It was a happy occasion when the scattered and persecuted congregation were once more privileged to praise God under their own roof-tree.

From that time forward, the history of this remarkable church is one of deepening spirituality and steadily widening influence. It became more and more of a power for good. It was, moreover, singularly fortunate in its choice of pastors—all, without exception, being men of eminent piety and beloved by their people. Rev. Nathaniel Woodhull (1790-1810), Rev. Wm. Boardman (1810-1818), Dr. John Goldsmith (1819-1854), Rev. John P. Knox (1855-1882), Rev. George H. Payson, D.D. (1882-1889), and Rev. Jacob E. Mallmann (1890-1895), were each instrumental, by their faithful labors, in bringing many into the Kingdom.

Rev. Wm. H. Hendrickson, the present pastor of the church, was installed June 26, 1896. He is a preacher of marked eloquence and ability, and is loved and greatly esteemed by all his people. Under his charge the old church has gone forward to still further spiritual triumphs; it has increased in membership and multiplied its avenues of usefulness in many directions. The First Presbyterian Church tolerant edicts of the English authorities against dissenting churches. These and other causes made the affairs of the young colony somewhat unsettled. After the resignation of Mr. Breck, the church building was seized by the authorities, and the Rev. William Urquhart was placed in spiritual charge. This attempt to force a State religion upon the people lasted nearly four years, when Lord Cornbury, the Governor of the province, having been removed, the stringency was relaxed. It was, however, a period of bitter oppression, a notable illustration of the bigoted spirit of the times being the arrest of two Presbyterian ministers—Revs. John Hampton and Francis Mackenzie—for preaching the Gospel in the church at Newtown.

A COUNTRY FESTIVAL AMONG THE MACEDONIANS

PRINCE FERDINAND OF BULGARIA

A GROUP OF BULGARIAN PEASANTS

THE CHRISTIAN SLAVES OF THE SULTAN

FROM Bulgaria comes the news of fresh outbreaks against the Christians in Turkish Macedonia. The complete destruction of a number of Christian villages is reported; the village of Oranove said to have been burned and the inhabitants massacred. About six hundred women, children and old men, have escaped across the frontier, to find safety in Bulgaria.

MACEDONIAN BRIGANDS

Macedonia has for some years been the chief centre of unrest in the European portion of the Sultan's dominions. Not inaptly it might be compared to a kettle simmering on the hob, the eyes of all the Balkan States and of Europe upon it, waiting for the moment when the water shall boil over.

It is impossible to draw a faithful picture of the poverty, the oppression and the hundred and one different ways in which the Christians are made to feel the bitterness and the terror of the slaves' lot, nor is it easy for anyone who has not traveled through the country to imagine the moral degradation of its inhabitants.

In Macedonia misgovernment has reached its climax. Direct religious persecution is only one of the dangers which the Christians face. Always overshadowing the prospect of any alleviation of their present state is the tax-gatherer, or, as he may be called, the official robber. It is the tax-gatherer, who, above anyone else, is responsible for the slow starvation which is eating away the life of the people. Between the tax-gatherer and his accomplice, or rival, the landlord, the poor peasant is crushed. The most unpleasant feature of the Turkish tax-gatherer is that his visits are not timed with any regularity; he may appear at a certain village at any time of the year and all payments must be forthcoming on the spot, under pain of persecution and imprisonment. His visits or visitations are marked with terrible cruelty.

Last autumn," says a traveler, the scene of the drama was Nigrita, a small but comparatively prosperous town in South Macedonia. It was the season of the vintage, and the peasants were employed in gathering the grapes. One day a rumor suddenly spread through the village that the tax-gatherer would be at Nigrita on the next morning but one. The effect of the news was instantaneous. All joy vanished at once, and a dark shadow seemed to have fallen over the place.

The mayor summoned the 'council' of notables in haste, and they set about drawing up the list of taxes to be assigned to each individual his rightful share. It was a sad yet somewhat amusing picture that those twelve red-capped, spectacled old men presented, as they sat cross-legged in a ring upon a mat spread under the shadow of the church belfry. The registers were produced, and opened upon two empty petroleum cases, which served as tables.

"In this fashion they continued their work hour after hour, shifting their mat as the sun shifted its position in the sky, so as to keep in the shade.

"No sooner had the council of elders concluded its labors than the tax-gatherers arrived, with a strong force of gendarmes. Those of the inhabitants who had been unable to get the money ready at the notice given had to suffer for their remissness. The prisons were crammed with such ill-fated mortals, while the narrow streets of the village rang with the cries of others dragged hither to the accompaniment of blows and the cracking of the whip. The cattle of some, the mules of others, were seized and confiscated. Those who had neither cattle nor mules were mercilessly robbed of their household goods and chattels. Neither the maiden's trousseau—the loved labor of many a long winter's night—nor the family meal-tub was spared. Over and above this misery the men-at-arms were quartered upon the peasants, had the best of everything, and, in return, beat their hosts and insulted their wives and daughters."

It seems safe to predict that sooner or later Macedonia will be the scene of a renewal of the Eastern drama: the centre, it may be, of a European war.

Throughout the country signs of military activity are everywhere visible. Since the last Greek war the different garrisons have been largely reinforced, and new ones have been established. Barracks and military hospitals are being raised—largely by means of the taxes imposed on the Christians. Beyond the taxes, "voluntary contributions" are called for—and a failure to contribute means flogging or imprisonment or both. In this manner are the Christians compelled to forge the fetters which bind them to servitude. It must not be supposed that the tax-gatherers are the only official robbers. The peasant taking his crops to market is stopped at the wayside guard-house, and invited to contribute to the provisions of the soldiers. Moreover, he is lucky if he is able to reach home without falling in with some of the wandering brigands, who, armed to as the Christian races hate their common oppressor, they would bear rather to be ruined by him than to agree on a common plan of action.

Macedonia is merely a geographical expression. It embraces Bulgaria, Roumelia, Roumania and all the territory that lies along the Balkans, from the Austrian border to the Black Sea. In Turkish Macedonia there is subjection, but in the Balkan provinces, the Macedonian agitators, encouraged by the diplomacy of Russia, conduct their revolutionary propaganda unhindered. Their country is peculiarly favorable to guerrilla tactics, being rugged and mountainous, with innumerable defiles and passes that abound in hiding-places for small bands of marauders.

In Philippopolis and Sofia, the centres of the Macedonian agitation, the anti-Turkish feeling is openly avowed. The leaders in this movement pose as the "patriots of the Balkan peninsula," and are very demonstrative in the antagonism to "the hated Turk" and all his belongings. It is the old struggle of Greek against Tartar; for the Turk, detached from the mixed races that go to make up his population, is a true Tartar. The Bulgarian knows that, left unaided, to the tender mercies of Turkey, he would soon be crushed; but he looks to his big northern neighbor, Russia, for something more than moral support when the pinch comes. Besides, the Bulgarian has a religious kinship with the Muscovite, for the Greek and Russian Churches unite in a common detestation of Mahomedanism and its followers. All these conditions are skilfully used by Russia in keeping up the Balkan agitation. Russia wants a southern port, giving her an outlet to the Mediterranean, and the present Macedonian turmoil is being employed as an argument to that end. If Turkey would grant this privilege, the pacification of the Balkans, under Russian influence, might follow.

the teeth, rove about the country in search of plunder. Many of these brigands are amateurs—that is to say, they are farmers one day and brigands the next; but before they exchange the spade for the musket they enter into an arrangement with the authorities, and thus are assured of immunity from persecution.

The Christians, on the other hand, are forbidden to carry any kind of arms, and are thus doubly at the mercy of the robbers.

It is an unfortunate fact that the Christians in Turkish Macedonia are divided among themselves. Fiercely be averse to replenishing the revolutionary treasury by an experiment like that which succeeded so well in the case of Miss Stone, they are quite convinced that the American government and people would not pay ransom a second time, and that such an outrage would not only result in disaster to the revolutionary movement, but would involve Bulgaria and her Balkan neighbors in troubles that might eventually benefit their ancient enemy, the Turk, and give him a stronger hold than ever on the ancient Greek province of the peninsula.

There is, fortunately, no truth in the rumor lately telegraphed from Turkey, that two American missionaries in Bulgaria were imperilled and in danger of either massacre or abduction. While the Macedonian agitators would not

End of the Coal Famine

PUBLIC attention, both here and abroad, will now be focussed upon the men who compose the Arbitration Commission appointed by the President to adjust the differences arising out of the recent coal strike. Whatever action they take will be closely scrutinized, and upon the final outcome of the entire proceeding the future methods adopted for settling labor troubles, on both sides of the Atlantic, will greatly depend. If the Commission's work should, fortunately, be followed by such legislation as would assure to the country a permanent tribunal for compulsory arbitration, the coal strike, with all of its wranglings, its discomforts, and its wasted millions, would be regarded in the light of a valuable educative experience, but one which ought never to be repeated.

We believe that the result of the Commission's labors may be looked forward to with confidence, the high character and standing of its members giving assurance that all questions will be treated with justice and generosity.

Operators and miners are alike to be congratulated on the situation, which, through their sensible course in accepting arbitration, is now greatly simplified, besides being decidedly more agreeable for the public. Let them now set to work with a will, to dig and ship coal, leaving all other matters in the hands of the Commission, before whom both sides are ably represented. So may peace return to the land, the household fires burn brightly, and cheerful warmth diffuse itself around the domestic hearth, as of old.

A Question of Conscience

PEOPLE in this country hear with surprise that clergymen, college professors and prominent laymen in Great Britain, have banded themselves in a pledge to resist a certain law, if it is passed by the Imperial Parliament. These are men who are known as strong advocates of obedience to law, and are stalwart believers in the supremacy of the representatives of the people in the House of Commons. We may be very sure that when they declare that if the law is passed, they will not obey it, there must be some very substantial reason for their conduct.

The proposed law is one for the reform of the educational system. At present, there are two kinds of schools in Great Britain. One of them is the school managed by a Board elected by the people, in which the teaching is strictly undenominational; the other, which is called the Voluntary School, is controlled by the church to which it belongs, generally the Church of England. The Government contributes to the support of schools of both kinds. It does not give all the money required. The balance is raised, in the case of the Board Schools, by a local tax; and in the case of the Voluntary Schools, by subscriptions. The Bill now before Parliament, proposes to deal with schools of both kinds. In respect to the Board Schools, it enacts that the management shall be vested in the Municipal Councils, and the Boards be abolished. The Councils are not to manage them themselves, but to nominate managers, who need not be members of the Council. In respect to the Voluntary Schools, it enacts that the balance of expenditure, over and above the Government grant, shall no longer be dependent on subscriptions, but shall be raised by a local tax. To both these proposals, a large number of conscientious men strenuously object. They are opposed to the change in the management of the Board Schools, because it deprives the people of the direct control of the schools and relegates it to men selected by the Councils. They are opposed to the change in respect to the Voluntary Schools, because it compels people who do not belong to the Church of England to pay for the teaching of the doctrines of that Church. It is alleged that in many districts, where the Voluntary Schools are managed by High Church clergymen, the teaching is practically Roman Catholic, and that the teaching has a tendency to pervert the minds of the children. They are required to bow to an image of the Virgin, to attend mass, and to learn the catechism of the High Church. Baptists, Congregationalists, and members of other Churches consider it an outrage that they should be compelled to pay a tax for the support of such teaching, and they declare they will not do it.

Like the Pilgrim Fathers and the Puritans, they will not contribute anything for the teaching of doctrines which they believe to be erroneous and pernicious.

The amount of money involved is very small, but to a conscientious man the principle is all-important. The opposition to the measure is, therefore, vigorous and determined; but there is little doubt that it will be enacted. The Government has threatened that if the Bill is rejected it will resign, and this threat will bring Members of Parliament into line. It remains to be seen what the opponents of the measure will do. If they are true to their principles, if they have the spirit of their forefathers, we shall see clergymen and prominent laymen under duress. Their household goods will be sold, and possibly they will be sent to prison for disobeying the law. The issue will be watched by Christians in all lands with profound interest.

Why the Shut Door?

DOES not Jesus mean to teach us that silence and solitude are handmaids of devotion? He sets prayer up among the weighty businesses of life, requiring purpose and deliberation, privacy and freedom from interruption.

If you are permitted sometime to inspect the safe deposit vaults of the Equitable Building, New York, you may see men with thoughtful faces, each with his box of valuables in his hand, pass along the corridor, and one here, another there, enters a little room alone, and shuts his door. How different his mien and his step from that of the aimless lounge on the street, or of the mere sight-seer, like yourself at that moment. Your guide tells you, perhaps, that that is Mr. Astor, or Mr. Rockefeller, and you begin to wonder how important may be the contents of that little package he carries, and how serious may be the business connected with his half-hour in that little room behind the shut door.

Prayer is more serious business. Jesus teaches, therefore, that it should be done not listlessly or lightly, or with careless haste, but with strenuous engagedness of soul, with concentration of faculties of mind and heart upon the act. Let your place of prayer, if possible, be a closet, that is, as the word means, a place shut in, where none may intrude, where you may be alone with your Maker and your Father.

The Arbitration Commission

ON the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we present the portraits of the Arbitration Commissioners, appointed by the President to consider the matters in dispute between the coal operators and the miners. The personnel of the Arbitration Commission is as follows:

—HON. GEORGE GRAY (of Delaware), Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court, and for many years one of the leading legal authorities in the country. He was for six years Attorney-General for Delaware; as a United States Senator he proved his ability as a statesman and non-partisan; was a member of the Joint High Commission which settled the questions at issue between the United States and Great Britain; was a member of the Peace Commission which arranged the treaty with Spain, and also of the Committee on International Arbitration authorized by the Hague Convention. He is chairman of the present Arbitration Commission.

—RT. REV. JOHN LANCASTER SPALDING, Catholic Bishop of Peoria, Ill., a man of much dignity, a profound thinker, intensely American, humanitarian to a marked degree, and with experience in former coal strikes. He is a pronounced friend of labor, and has frequently criticized trusts severely.

—GEN. JOHN M. WILSON, an army officer of wide experience; no politician; a fine engineer and practical scientist; accustomed to large enterprises; a great lover of order and discipline; just, even-minded and rigidly honorable.

—E. E. CLARK, Chief of the Order of Railway Conductors; a student of labor problems; friend of arbitration; a careful investigator; unalterably opposed to strikes as a means of settling labor troubles.

—THOMAS HOMER WATKINS, a prominent business man of Pittsburgh, and at one time one of the largest individual mining operators in the anthracite region. He resigned from all his anthracite interests nearly two years ago. His experience should be valuable to the Commission.

—EDWARD WHEELER PARKER, the youngest member of the Commission; a mining engineer and editor, and one of the best informed men in America on all the subjects to come before the Commission.

—CARROLL D. WRIGHT, Commissioner of Labor, Recorder of the Arbitration Commission. A famous statistician and expert on all sociological and industrial problems. He has been Chief of the Government Labor Bureau for last seventeen years.

Mr. John Mitchell, of the United Mine Workers' Union, though not a member of the Commission, it is understood will represent the miners at the session of that body.

The points which it is expected will come up for consideration, include these:

1. The right of the operators to employ non-union miners laborers.
2. The reinstatement of former strikers.
3. The question of an increase of twenty per cent. in wages, working by the ton.
4. Recognition of the union.
5. Damage to property by strikers and liability therefor.
6. The blacklist system.
7. The contract system in mining labor.
8. The observance of the eight-hour day rule.
9. Establishment of a uniform weight ton of 2,240 pounds at mines.

Many other points, not now foreseen, will undoubtedly arise, making the Commission, as a whole, the most important body this Government has ever appointed, as far as nation's industrial interests are concerned.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

The Most Beautiful Hand

—THAT IS THE most beautiful foot which goes about part of greatest usefulness, and that the most beautiful hand which does the most to help others. I was reading of the women who were in rivalry about the appearance of their hand. And the one reddened her hand with berries, a said the beautiful tinge made hers the most beautiful. Another put her hand in the mountain brook, and said, the waters dripped off, that her hand was the most beautiful. And another plucked flowers off the bank, and under the bloom contended that her hand was the most attractive. Then a poor old woman appeared, and, looking up in her decrepitude, asked for alms. And a woman who had not taken part in the rivalry gave her alms. And all the women resolved to leave to this beggar the question as to which all the hands present was the most attractive, and she said, "The most beautiful of them all is the one that gave relief my necessities," and as she so said her wrinkles and her decrepitude and her body disappeared, and in place thereof stood the Christ, who long ago said, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it to me!" who to purchase the service of our hand and foot here on earth or in resurrection state, had his own hand and foot lacerated.

Eternal Life

—THE SLAB of the tomb is only the milestone on which we read of infinite distance yet to be traveled. The worst itself will grow old and die. The stars of our night will burn down in their sockets and expire. The sun, like a spade struck from an anvil, will flash and go out. The winds will utter their last whisper, and ocean heave its last groan; but you and I will live forever! Gigantic—immortal. Mighty to suffer or enjoy. Mighty to love or hate. Mighty to soar or to sink. Then, what will be to us the store, the shop, the office, the applause of the world, the scorn of our enemies the things that lifted us up, and the things that pressed us down? What to John Wesley are all the mobs that howled after him? What to Voltaire are all the nations that applauded him? What to Paul now the dungeons that chilled him? What to Latimer now the flames that consumed him? All those who through the grace of Christ reach that land will never be disturbed. None to dispute their throne, the shall reign forever and ever.

The Greatest King

—SHOW ME any other king who has so many subjects. What is the most potent name to-day in the United States in France, in England, in Scotland, in Ireland? Jesus. Other kings have had many subjects, but where is the king who has so many admiring subjects as Christ? Show me a regiment of a thousand men in their army, and I will show you a brigade of ten thousand men in Christ's army. Show me in history where one man has given his property and his life for any one else, and I will show you in history hundred and thousands of men who have cheerfully died that Christ might reign. Ay, there are a hundred men in this house who if need were, would step out and die for Jesus. Their faith may now seem to be faint, and sometimes they may be inconsistent; but let the fires of martyrdom be kindled, throw them into the pit, cover them with poisonous serpents, pound them, flail them, crush them, and I tell you what their last cry would be: "Come Lord Jesus, come quickly."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Emperor's Gift

NEWS comes from Germany that Emperor William is preparing to give a practical demonstration of his friendliness to this country. He was, it appears, much impressed by the cordial welcome given to Prince Henry during his recent visit. He now proposes to make the United States a present of a bronze cast of the heroic statue of Frederick the Great, by the great sculptor, Johann Gottfried Schadow, which was erected in 1793, seven years after the king's death. The original statue is singularly life-like, and is in the famous sculptor's best style. It represents Frederick in military garb, and wearing the familiar cocked hat, which he was accustomed to beat into a comfortable softness whenever he could bring himself to buy a new one. The lower limbs are encased in high over-knee military boots, which, long after his campaigns closed, he wore in his daily rides and walks about Berlin. The king's features show the alertness and prompt decision which were the strongest of his characteristics. An interesting figure, expressing with wonderful skill the personality of that marvelous man who, driven to bay by the most powerful combination of forces ever hurled against any potentate, fought with a courage and desperation that won the sympathy even of his enemies, and by his genius and indomitable vigor triumphed over all his foes. It is not surprising that the Emperor of Germany venerates the memory of this greatest of all his predecessors, who gave his country its first real impetus on the road to its present eminence. It is, however, in some aspects, a strange selection to make for a gift to a Republic. Frederick was one of the most autocratic kings who ever wielded a sceptre; but the Emperor probably thought that, even in a country that has forsworn kings, the sturdy, vigorous character of the Prussian hero will command respect. The qualities of Frederick's nature were those that make any nation prosperous.

For the transgression of a land many are the princes thereof; but by a man of understanding and knowledge the state thereof shall be prolonged (Prov. 28: 2).

A Store Closed by Bees

A grocery store at East Orange, N. J., was temporarily closed for a day last week, on account of a swarm of bees which had taken possession of it. The proprietors had received a large consignment of honey. The cases had been opened and the small boxes inside had been taken out. Some of the latter had been opened to examine the honey and had been exposed. A bee flew in and, having tasted the honey, flew away. In a few minutes a large number of bees flew in, and soon a second and a third swarm came. In a short time the invaders became so numerous that customers and employees were compelled to beat a retreat. Business was suspended until night. On the next day the experiment was made of putting some of the boxes of honey on the sidewalk. The bees were attracted to them and they deserted the store. The clerks then had an opportunity of covering up the opened boxes and business was resumed. The bees were insignificant claimants for the sweet treasure, but they drove off all others. If men were only as much in earnest in their endeavor to gain the treasures of the Gospel no obstacles would hold them back; yet the sweets of the Christian life are infinitely better.

More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey, and the honey-comb (Ps. 19: 10).

A Daring Rescue

The life of a little child was saved on the Ontario & Western Railroad near Middletown, N. Y., by the daring act of a brakeman, on Oct. 11. The brakeman was in the cab of the locomotive as the train was approaching Olyphant at high speed. Looking along the track he saw a little girl playing between the rails at some distance ahead. She seemed totally unconscious of the danger of the place she was in, and though the whistle was blown, she either did not hear it, or did not know that it was for her. Realizing that it would be impossible to stop the heavy freight train before reaching the child, he crawled along the engine to the cow-catcher. Leaning well forward, he grasped the child's clothes as the locomotive almost touched her. He lifted her in his arms and crawled back with her to the cab. In the meantime the engineer, who had seen the daring act, shut off steam and applied the brakes. The train came to a standstill, and the brakeman had the pleasure of conveying the child to her home. We admire an act so courageous, but how few there are who avail themselves of opportunities to save the young from a worse fate. Many children are in peril of being crushed under temptation who might be saved if Christians would only make the attempt.

It is not the will of your father in heaven that one of these little ones should perish (Matt. 18: 14).

Result of Boyhood Injury

A remarkable instance of an injury producing grave effects long after it was inflicted, is reported from Jersey City, N. J. A man thirty years of age was taken to Christ Hospital in that city on October 15, in an unconscious condition. For three years past he has been suffering severe pains in the head at intervals of uncertain duration. They have become worse of late and at last he sank into unconsciousness. He was then taken to the hospital and an examination made. It was found that a small splinter of the skull, broken in an old fracture, had become displaced, and had penetrated to the brain. The irritation had caused the formation of an abscess. An operation was performed, the splinter of bone removed, and the abscess dressed. The patient experienced speedy relief. He was asked how the skull was fractured, and replied that his head had not been injured since he was a boy eight years old. While playing with his elder brother, he had been accidentally hit by a stone. The wound soon healed, and he experienced no ill effects until the headaches came on three years ago. Then he remembered his boyhood hurt. The surgeons say that the bone was doubtless broken then, but the splintered portion had remained in place. Only when it became detached did it cause trouble. It is well that the cause of the trouble was detected and so effectually removed. Unhappily, the seed of evil implanted in youth is not so easily remedied. It blossoms out in maturity and does irreparable mischief.

His bones are full of the sin of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust (Job. 20: 11).

The Finest Missionary Memorial

A notable event of the recent annual meeting of the American Board at Oberlin, O., was the laying of the corner-stone of a monument, which will become famous the world over. It is to be a memorial to the missionaries of the Board, who fell in China during the Boxer rising, two years ago. The Board suffered heavily in those troubles, having lost no less than thirteen missionaries, who bravely laid down their lives for the faith. Ten of the thirteen were graduates of Oberlin College, so that it is appropriate that the memorial should be erected on the College campus. It is to cost twenty thousand dollars, and will undoubtedly be the finest missionary monument in the world. The names of the murdered missionaries who are to be commemorated by means of the monument are: Annie A. Gould, Horace T. Pitkin, Mary S. Morrill, Ernest R. Atwater, Elizabeth G. Atwater, Rowena Bird, Dwight H. Clapp, Mary J. Clapp, Francis W. Davis, Mary L. Partridge, Charles W. Price, Eva J. Price and George L. Williams. It is well that a memorial should be raised to such noble workers, though it is not likely that their memory can ever perish. America has reason to be proud of such brave, faithful martyrs, and all Christendom will hold them in undying honor. Like their Divine Master, they gave the highest proof of their love for the people whom they sought to save.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends (John 15: 13).

Stitching a Heart

One of the most wonderful operations on record was performed at Bellevue Hospital, New York, a few days ago. A woman was taken there suffering from a stab-wound inflicted by her husband, under the influence of liquor. The surgeon quickly perceived, from the symptoms, that a vital organ had been injured, and when her clothing was removed and the wound exposed, it was plain that the organ injured must be her heart. She was placed under the influence of anæsthetics and the wound was enlarged. It was found that the heart had been punctured. The woman would surely die if nothing was done, so the surgeon determined on making an effort to close the puncture without stopping the beating of the heart. It can easily be realized how difficult the task was, but it was done, and the flesh-wound was closed. She survived the operation, and, two days later, was reported to be recovering, but on the third day she had a relapse and died. The doctors are deeply disappointed, though they were aware, when the operation was performed, that the hope of her recovery was very slender. Skilful as the operation was, it could not cure a wounded heart. Too often, also, those who suffer from metaphorical wounds of the heart are beyond human help, but, happily for them, Divine help is provided.

He hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted (Isa. 61: 1).

BRIEF NOTES

The American Bible Society, at its recent meeting, voted to accept the manuscript of the Sheetswa New Testament prepared by Rev. E. H. Richards, of East Africa, and to publish at once an edition of the New Testament in this dialect for the use of the Inhambane East Africa Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

A remarkable evangelistic work is in progress at York, Neb. Rev. R. P. Cross, the senior pastor of the city, has organized a united movement of the evangelical churches, and Mr. W. B. Williams has been engaged to lead the meetings. A large tabernacle, capable of seating 5,000 people has been erected, a chorus of 250 voices gathered, and all indications point to a widespread movement of permanent power.

Lady Henry Somerset has arranged, after the conclusion of the W. C. T. U. convention at Portland, Me., to deliver an address in Boston on the afternoon of Oct. 26, in Tremont Temple. The party will then attend the Provincial Convention of the W. C. T. U. in Ontario; thence returning to fulfil engagements in Washington and New York City, sailing from the latter city on their return trip in late November.

A letter has been received from Mr. R. J. Young, whose excellent work in Brazil was described in this journal on July 2. Mr. Young is now back in his field of labor, and finds that the cause has made good progress during his absence. His converts are proving earnest workers, and are zealous and self-denying in their labor for Christ. Two of them accompanied one of his colleagues recently in a tour of the southern States of Brazil and proved successful preachers of the Word. Mr. Young hopes to send them out on a longer journey as soon as he can obtain funds for the purpose. He describes the prospect of Gospel work as most hopeful.

Promises Broken and Kept

The Time of the Judges

 INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 16
 JUDGES 2: 7-16

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

 GOLDEN TEXT—"THEY CRY UNTO THE LORD IN THEIR TROUBLE, AND HE SAVETH THEM OUT OF THEIR DISTRESSES." PS. 107: 19

MOST interesting are the national historical paintings of France, at Versailles, and of the United States, at the National Capitol. Let us make such a series of national word pictures for the Israelites:

Abraham leaving Ur, taking with him his aged father, Terah, and his wife, Sarah, also his company of 318 servants, and all his sheep, oxen, and camels. Following on is Lot and all his family, and servants and cattle. God has promised to give Abraham a land where he shall found a nation.

A solitary pilgrim, with a stone for a pillow, is sleeping under the canopy of the sky. It is Jacob, grandson of Abraham. A heavenly smile illumines his face. God, though unseen, is holding communion with him, and repeating to him the promise which was made to Abraham.

In a field there is a bush all aflame, but it does not burn up. By this signal God calls the shepherd Moses to come into his presence, and repeats to him the promise that he has made before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that the Israelites shall possess Canaan. God commissions Moses to be their leader.

It is Shechem, "holy ground," because God first met Abraham there on his entrance to the Promised Land. There is now a vast concourse, for the people have inherited the Promised Land. They are already on the ground. Near Abraham's oak, a stone is placed by the aged Joshua, as a sign that the people have promised to be faithful to their God.

It is a beautiful landscape. Happy homes are seen everywhere. Wise teachers, with God's law in their hands, are going from house to house instructing the people. For twenty-five years after the death of Joshua this picture was true to life; for as long as the elders who had been with Joshua lived, the people remembered their promise to God.

This picture is an unhappy contrast to the preceding one. The stone under the oak no longer has any meaning. It is broken in fragments, for the people have learned to worship idols instead of the true God. In groves and on hill tops we see their idols. Instead of peaceful, happy homes, we see terrible war everywhere.

Almost every nation in the world has portraits of famous men and women. There are fifteen "judges" whose portraits Israel might well wish to preserve as "immortals." Among these the first four are:

EHUD

Holding in his left hand the sword with which he killed Eglon, King of Moab.

SHAMGAR

Who was a farmer as well as judge, holding his ox-goad, with which he slew 600 Philistines in delivering Israel.

DEBORAH AND BARAK

Deborah sits under a palm tree where she judges Israel. Barak, judge and general, seeks her co-operation.

The Israelites needed such helpers as Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah and Barak, because they had fallen away from their promise to serve only the true God. They had brought upon themselves "all evil things," of which Joshua had warned them, on that eventful day when the stone was set up under the oak. They had been told that the measure of evil which they should receive from God would compare with the measure of good which they had received from him (Joshua 23: 15). For about one hundred years in all, but not all at one time, the Israelites of the period of the judges were permitted to suffer for their wrongdoing. He had not forsaken them, but they had forsaken him. These years were the "dark ages" of Israel. But no darkness is too great for God's mercy to stream through. What streaks of mercy-light we see in the words: "Nevertheless the Lord raised up judges which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them!"

Illustration and Application

1. "Evil communications corrupt good manners."
2. Evil doing brings distress.
3. Repentance brings deliverance.

The children of Israel did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. When every man did what "was right in his eyes," he was doing "evil in the sight of the Lord." "The Lord seeth not as man seeth."

Tempters Becoming Tormentors

We should seek to get the God's-eye view of everything. Paul said, "I know nothing against myself yet am I not thereby justified, but he that judgeth me is the Lord." We can do nothing behind God's back, nothing of which he needs to say, Show it to me. Let us so live that it will be not a terror, but a joy to work "in our Great Taskmaster's eye." How it inspires the college athlete to know that his teacher or father is in the onlooking crowd! How much more should we earnestly run life's race under the eye of a loving God? In the last lesson at Shechem, these Israelites had adopted the covenant that God made with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moses, and made it their own. They would be true to God, who had chosen them for a great service to the world. While Joshua lived and the elders associated with him, the promise had been kept fairly well—only they had not driven out altogether the corrupt Canaanites. They were like the man who to-day does not seek grace enough to conquer in his heart the very love of sin, but is content to be free from its guilt and power. Corresponding to the heathen left in the Holy Land to its great harm are the evils often left in the hearts of professing Christians who have paused too soon in heart conquest. In the soul that should be holy, we find the Amorites of anger, and the Moabites of malice, and the Philistines of pride, and were left in the Holy Land made sin and consequent sorrow for Israel. The sin in this lesson, Prof. W. Henry Green says, was caused by two things, "neglect of parental instruction and evil companionship." The sons of Israel married the daughters of Canaan, and thus evil communications corrupted good manners and good morals. Such cases then and now point us to the first Psalm and "the blessedness of the man who walketh not in the counsel of the wicked, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of scoffers, but his delight is in the law of Jehovah." Except when duty sends us to the wicked we should avoid them, for most people who mingle socially with the Romans will do as the Romans do, and how the Romans did the historians are telling all too vividly. Even more corrupt were the Canaanites, whose very religion was immorality at its worst. Bishop H. W. Warren thinks that Palestine was the very capital of corrupt worship before God made it the capital of pure religion. If the worship of Astarte had not been exterminated by the wars of which this lesson tells in part, skin. Only by hours of effort did the doctor save her life. This is a faint picture of the harm to character and reputation that may come from one wrong word or act, or on evening's improper fellowship. On a certain mountain farm, where there was a copper mine, certain rills were used for the mine, and others were protected against its contamination by gates, that they might be used for drinking water on the farm and in the village below. One day, the boy in charge of the principal gate neglected to close it, and farm and village found the drinking water poisoned for the day by the murky mine washings. Even a small sin of omission may have a multitude, fouling and poisoning the spring of life. These Israelites it would seem, did not at first worship Astarte, but only small images of Jehovah, corresponding to the crucifixes of to-day. Then they worshiped images of Astarte also, not at first abandoning their images of Jehovah. So, in all ages, men go into sin step by step, not with one sudden leap. But they get there just the same—the depths of sin and its sorrow.

The lesson speaks after the manner of men, of God's "anger," but it was anger only at the sin, with love for the sinner. As pain is love's signal that we may avoid danger or seek recovery, so God's punishments in this world are like those of noblest parents, who chasten to save. It would be a sad thing indeed if evil did not bring distress that distress may bring repentance and repentance deliverance.

The Lord raised up saviours. Such was the meaning of what we call "judges." They were "liberators," like Bolivar and Joan of Arc. God did not send these "saviours" until distress had prompted repentance. A daily paper has recently noted the fact that religion loses when commerce gains. As prosperity increases prayer decreases. Peter on the waves reminds us that "sinking times are praying times."

"Evil," "distress," "repentance," "deliverance," these are the four notes, descending and ascending, that recur over and over again through all the story of the Judges. The generation that had suffered for its sins would have a period of peace, and then a new generation would repeat the sin of their fathers and their consequent sorrow, with their repentance, followed by their own deliverance and peace. In the words of Burns:

They zigzag on. The papers report a new elevator disease, the heart being harmed by so much going up and down. There is also a sickly state of soul in those who are spiritually addicted to "ups and downs." But even the chronic backsliders may find mercy. God says of them, "I will heal their backslidings, I will love them freely," "Love is divine and then most divine when it loves according to needs and not according to merits," "Forgiveness can never be indifference, Forgiveness is love for the unlovely," "I will compass them about," saith the Lord, "with songs of deliverance."

History deals mostly with dark things. Dr. Howard Crosby tells us there were two hundred years of peace and fidelity in the period of the Judges to one hundred of sin and consequent oppression.

Through all these pictures of man's inconsistency "one unchanging purpose runs"—God's plan to make a nation that shall save a world. Faithful men then and now rest even in most trying times in the assurance that God reigns. It was this that gave the Judges courage to be saviours at the peril of their lives. We, too, should be saviours, if not of a whole country or city, at least of the souls about us.

Be strong!

We are not here to play, to dream, to drift,
 We have hard work to do, and loads to lift.
 Shun not the struggle—face it; 'tis God's gift.

Be strong!

Say not the days are evil; who's to blame?
 And fold the hands and acquiesce—oh, shame!
 Stand up, speak out, and bravely, in God's name.

Be strong!

It matters not how deep entrenched the wrong,
 How hard the battle goes, the day how long,
 Faint not—fight on! To-morrow comes the song.
 MALTBE D. BABCOCK.

A WOMAN SACRIFICED TO BAAL

the Jebusites of jealousy, and the Ammonites of appetite, and the Hivites of hatred, and the Midianites of meanness, and the Canaanites of covetousness. How startled we are sometimes to see in some seemingly holy heart—perhaps our own—on strong provocation, some passion rise up like some son of Anak, supposed to be dead, suddenly issuing from a cave to assert his dominance! The Israelites broke their promise, so solemnly made in the last lesson, perhaps because a purpose in the head that is not in the heart does not last. When our country was in a financial depression, and various remedies were being discussed, one man declared the simple remedy was to every Congress make every man's note a legal tender, and then there would be plenty of money at once. How the story, like a flash light, reminds us, while we laugh at its simplicity, of the unreliability of most human promises. In these days, even vows and oaths, which are promises to God, are held lightly, and common promises to men are hastily made and thoughtlessly broken. How it would brighten the world if every man's word was as good as his bond!

Let our heart conquest go on to the complete fulfilment of the promise, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The very capital of Palestine, Jebus, was unconquered, symbol of a will not yet fully subject to "the sweet Will of God." For a thousand years these Canaanites that he thinks it would have rotted the whole race.

The Lord delivered them into the hands of spoilers. Sin, as always, brought distress. Tempters yielded to become tormentors. The people had broken their promise to God to be faithful, but God kept his word that if they broke the covenant, he would punish them to restore them (Josh. 23: 13, 15). God used the sword of their enemies as his lance of love. Men say foolishly that "God is too good to punish," but past punishments, in which he has kept his word, prove he will do so in future punishment. To all who say he can not or will not punish, we answer he has. Those punishments, first of all, came as promised, and, second, were very severe. There is nothing history teaches more plainly, and yet nothing seems harder to learn than that sin brings sorrow, though always promising pleasure. No one starts out to do more than one little sin. The Israelite's sin began in forgetting God in a period of peace and prosperity. In these days it is easy to realize how they could have done that. The next step would be some little sin of social fellowship with the idolaters. But how great results come from little wrongs! Sin begins in a spring but ends in a roaring torrent. A lady, in drinking a glass of water at night, swallowed a small black spider, that had dropped into the bucket at night. She vomited it out, but not until it had bitten her. The poison quickly spread through her system, and her flesh swelled so that the blood oozed through the miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee.

St. John 5

Chapter 5

AFTER this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

2 ¶ Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches.

3 In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.

4 For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had.

5 And a certain man was there, which had an infirmity thirty and eight years.

6 When Jesus saw him lie, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, Wilt thou be made whole?

7 The impotent man answered him, Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me.

8 Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk.

9 And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the same day was the sabbath.

10 ¶ The Jews therefore said unto him that was cured, It is the sabbath day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed.

11 He answered them, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk.

12 Then asked they him, What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk?

13 And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place.

14 Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.

15 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus, which had made him whole.

16 And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath day.

17 ¶ But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God.

Explanatory

THIS EDITION of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, Self-pronouncing and unchanged save for the variation of color in the type. Two colors (red and black) are employed, in accordance with the following simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch:

- 1 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Lord and Saviour are printed in red.
- 2 In the Old Testament, the passages printed in red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which He referred.
- 3 Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.
- 4 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ.

LIKE UNTO THIS!

Here the actual words, quotations, references and allusions of Christ, not separated from their context, nor in a fragmentary or disconnected form, but in their own proper place, as an integral part of the Sacred Record, stand out vividly conspicuous in the distinction of color. The plan also possesses the advantage of showing how frequently and how extensively, on the authority of Christ himself, the authenticity of the Old Testament is confirmed, thus greatly facilitating comparison and verification, and enabling the student to trace the connection between the Old and the New, link by link, passage by passage.

Isaiah 55

^ahe shall prolong his days, and ^tthe pleasure of the LORD shall prosper in his hand.

11 He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: ^u"by his knowledge shall ^zmy righteous ^vservant ^zjustify many; ^afor he shall bear their iniquities.

12 ^bTherefore will I divide him a portion with the great, ^cand he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and ^dhe was ^dnumbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and ^emade intercession for the transgressors.

Chapter 54

¹ The prophet, for the comfort of the Gentiles, prophesieth the amplitude of their church, ⁶ their certain deliverance out of affliction, ¹⁵ and their sure preservation.

^aSING, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child: for ^bmore are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife, saith the LORD.

2 ^cEnlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes;

3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; ^dand thy seed shall inherit the Gen'tiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.

4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.

5 ^eFor thy Maker is thine husband; the ^fLORD of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Ig'ra-el; ^gThe God of the whole earth shall he be called.

6 For the LORD ^hhath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God.

7 ⁱFor a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee.

9 For this is as the waters of 'Nō'ah unto me: for as I have sworn that the waters of Nō'ah should no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee nor rebuke thee.

10 For ^mthe mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; ⁿbut my kindness shall not depart from thee neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee.

11 ¶ O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold I will lay thy stones with ^ofair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires.

12 And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones.

13 And all thy children shall be taught of the LORD; and ^qgreat shall be the peace of thy children.

14 In righteousness shalt thou be established: thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear and from terror; for it shall not come near thee.

15 Behold, they shall surely gather together, but not by me: whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake.

16 Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy.

17 ¶ No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD, ^rand their righteousness is of me, saith the LORD.

day he entered into the synagogue, and taught.

22 ^aAnd they were astonished at his doctrine: for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes.

23 ^bAnd there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit;
and he cried out,

24 Saying, Let us alone; ^c what have we to do with thee, thou Jē'sus of Nāz'a-rēth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, abroad throughout all the region round about Gāl'i-lee.

29 ^fAnd forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue, they entered into the house of Si'mon and An'drew, with Jāmes and Jōhn.

30 But Si'mon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever, and anon they tell him of her.

31 And he came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them.

32 ^gAnd at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils.

33 And all the city was gathered together at the door.

34 And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils; and ^hsuffered not the devils ⁱto speak, because they knew him.

35 And ^jin the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed.

In the Red Letter Bible, more clearly than in any other edition of the Holy Scriptures, it becomes plain that, from beginning to end, the central figure upon which all lines of law, history, poetry and prophecy converge is Jesus Christ the Saviour of the world. It sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the ful-

Act To-day—To-morrow May Be Too Late

THE writer of this Announcement is at a Loss for words to Describe in Adequate Terms the wondrous beauty of the Family Art Gallery, which, in honor of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the founding of his great paper, the publisher of The Christian Herald generously offers to send free to each and every subscriber, whose subscription reaches him before the 200,000 complete sets which he has provided, are exhausted. In view of the fact that there are now many more than that number of subscribers, most of whom will surely renew, it is quite evident that both old and new subscribers will have to act with great promptness. This fine collection consists of exquisite reproductions of ten Masterpieces in their Original Colors aggregating a full thousand square inches of superb color-work, the value of which cannot be measured by the ordinary standard of dollars and cents.

The Christian Herald always excels in its premiums the advertised description, but this year even its oldest and best friends will marvel at the surpassing attractiveness of its Family Art Gallery. New subscribers, who are not acquainted with the generous treatment that characterizes its every transaction, will not be able to understand how The Christian Herald can afford such a generous gift. Nevertheless it is a fact, though it may baffle many to understand how it is possible.

Should your subscription reach us too late to entitle you to this unprecedented gift, we will send you a telegram at our own expense, and your money will be immediately refunded by mail. This is done to mitigate disappointment, and to enable you to use the money, without unnecessary loss of time, in some other direction.

Please remember that there are a full thousand square inches of unexcelled color work in this Art Gallery, and that it goes free to every subscriber whether new or old; With or Without Premium or Magazine Combination. All get it, and all will surely be delighted with it.

Four months of steady labor, by the ablest artists, have been spent on this work, and the result is grand, glorious, superb, beyond compare. The above picture is simply used to illustrate the page. It is NOT one of our collection, none of which have ever been promiscuously published.

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Next-Door Neighbor

THE house next door had been untenanted ever since Jessica could remember. It was a white house with green blinds, and long galleries running around two stories. Great trees stood closely about it like sentinels. Jessica had a fancy that the trees felt sorry for the lonesome house, and took special care of it on windy nights when its loose shutters banged to and fro, and made an eerie sound.

"Oh! mother, come here!" cried Jessica, one stormy evening, as she stood by her window, taking a last look at the world of outdoors, before she went to bed. "Oh! mother, see; there is somebody in the house next door!"

"Impossible, daughter," answered Mrs. Donaldson. Nevertheless, she came to the window.

Then it was her turn to be surprised.

Sure enough, there were lights moving about in the front chamber upstairs, and presently the watchers made out the figure of a man in what looked like a long dressing-gown, standing opposite them and gazing steadily at something or somebody, whom they could not see.

"Strange!" said Mrs. Donaldson; "but I'm glad. It's been so desolate over there since Miss Jenny died. She died the year you were born, Jessica, and her people shut the house and went away. None of them have ever been back since. I had an idea they would never come home."

Jessica went to bed, but it was not to go to sleep at once. She was a dreamy little creature, fond of weaving fancies. Her head was full of exciting thoughts and it was long before she lost consciousness. When she did fall asleep, she had a very queer dream.

She was rapping softly, in the dead of night, at the outer door of the next house. She was in her white night-gown, but somebody had slipped her warm, fleecy, pink kimona over that, and her feet were in her lamb's-wool slippers, so she did not feel cold. As she knocked, the door was opened by a tall gentleman, with a silver lamp in his hand. He had dark eyes, that glowed like flame, and a white beard, falling low on his breast.

"Why, Jenny!" he exclaimed. "My own, wee Jenny. Come right in, lady-bird. They told me you were never coming home, but I knew better. I knew it was a mistake. I've come three thousand miles to find you, little Jenny. Come right in."

Jessica did not stop to explain that her name was not Jane; she stepped inside the hall, and followed her guide up the stair into a room, where there was a bright fire blazing on the hearth. A table was spread for supper. There were rolls and honey and fruit. "Jenny," said the gentleman, "you must be hungry; help yourself, child." So Jenny in the dream did as she was told, and ate a peach, which had a most delicious flavor. The man ate, too; then sat down in a big chair, forgot about his guest, and was directly fast asleep.

Jessica stole away, so she thought in her dream, and was immediately back in her own room, and in her own bed.

"Jessica, dear child!" said her mother, the next morning, "how came you to be so careless? You have stains of peach juice on your new kimona, and your new bedroom slippers are as damp as if you had been trailing about in the wet grass."

"Then it was not a dream," exclaimed Jessica, sitting up very straight and opening her eyes very wide. "I must have really gone into the house next door, as I dreamed I did. Mother, there is such a dear old gentleman there, and he called me Jenny! I did eat a peach there, really. I thought it was merely a dream. Oh, what fun!"

But her father and mother did not think it fun to have a child who walked in her sleep, and they moved Jessica's bed into their own room, and took every precaution against the repetition of her escapade. They said little about it, but one result of the affair was that they took Jessica out of school, and gave her many hours of happy, romping play in the garden, and many rides on her pony's back in the days that followed.

The mysterious personage next door was seldom visible by daylight. Muffled up in a long cloak, he often walked forth in the dusk, and soon the village grew familiar with his appearance on the street. He bought bread at the baker's and milk at the grocer's, but encouraged no conversation, and did not so much as take the trouble to answer when spoken to. Often he stood in his door, peering out and seemingly looking for somebody, and once, when Jessica was playing in the road, he called out pleadingly, "Jenny, Jenny; come, child! Grandpapa's waiting for you, dearie."

Jessica's mother did not like to have Jessica go to him, and would not permit her to do more than step up to the threshold of the house and return immediately.

"You need not be afraid of the old captain," said Jessica's father. "Old Fido knows him, and isn't afraid. The man whom a dog trusts may be trusted with a child."

disentangle the two. And he gave a whole heart full of love to the little golden-haired new claimant upon his affection.

One morning, Jessica, who had gone to sleep nine years old, woke up ten. She had a birthday. Her parents gave her lovely things on her birthday. And she had a party, and invited old Captain Sage. He said he would come with pleasure, after the other playmates left, but he did not wish to be seen till they had said good-night.

So, last of all, in walked the captain. He brought Jessica a very beautiful present, one that any little girl would have been delighted to have. It was a rosewood desk with a golden key, and the inside was smooth as satin, and ornamented with mother-of-pearl. The desk had curious old-fashioned note-paper, a great store of it, all trimmed with lace. There was a stick of pale pink sealing-wax, a tiny box of matches, and a stamp with the letter J. Jessica had fallen heir to Jennie's writing-desk.

"I am sending her a trunk full of Jennie's things," he said, and the next hour it was brought in by two men. The trunk contained the most beautiful dresses any little girl could wish for, and besides, a doll and an outfit, which made ten-year-old Jessica laugh and cry.

"I am going away," said the old captain. "I am never coming back. To-morrow, I shall be on the sea. I hear it calling me. I want this dear sweet child to have everything that belonged to my Jenny. I've got it straight now. Jenny and her dear ones are all safe in port, and the old mariner will soon be there too. So good-bye, everybody. Good-bye, little maiden fair."

But it was no earthly ocean wave that called old Captain Sage. When another day dawned, he had drifted safe into port himself, and was in the land immortal with the sweet little Jenny, of whom Jessica had so often reminded him.

"In a Minute"

Now, when your little daughter says "In a minute, mother," you reprove her, for children must obey their parents. When you say this to her you have no idea that you deserve reproof, have you? And yet, in most cases, you could perfectly well give her the little help she asks, or take up the rent in her doll's frock, or show her how to finish-off her crocheting, not in a minute, but immediately, if only you would. Most kind things gain immensely by being done at once. Don't say "in a minute" to little Mary, unless you cannot possibly oblige her without the delay.

A trifle is so much more to a child than it can be to a grown person that the latter should be careful how she ever causes the little heart disappointment or regret.

The Old, Old Story

When you wish to lift a soul out of gloom, when you would rescue one from misery and deliver him from temptation, tell him again the old, old story of Jesus and his love. Nothing else is so potential. Nothing else is so wonderful. Tell it simply, tell it prayerfully, tell it convincingly, tell it to the individual. There is no other story that means so much, that has a meaning so profound. Jesus came to save. That truth will yet renew the face of the globe. That blessed salvation will yet win the world from darkness to light that shall never fade.

Who Was to Blame?

"They started out with flattering prospects, but they managed to wreck their hopes between them. I never knew who was to blame."

The speaker passed in a crowd. Her query was not answered. But in most cases of domestic disagreement and ruined happiness, both are to blame. Two old bears—bear and forbear—would prevent most of the needless wretchedness of this queer old world.

The Best He Could

When the child brings his work to the master, that it may be marked as work is marked in school, the master takes several things into account. The child's age, his capacity, his faithful endeavor, and the pains he has taken, all enter into the account when the merits and demerits are set beside the task. So, at the end of our day, when we go to the great Master, and show him what we have done, he will take many things into his account of which humanity takes little note. Infinite pity, infinite love, infinite wisdom, in him will be blent with perfect justice.

A FOX HUNT—HARD BESET

The poor fox, hotly pursued by the hounds in full cry, and by a mob of gentlemen on horseback, rushes through the open door of the farmhouse, to the dismay of the grandmother, and the fright of the bonny group of children. Chairs and tables are overthrown, but the fox runs clear out into the open again, let us hope, to escape from his enemies. Poor little fox. Sport has its cruel side, whoever may defend it.

"I had not thought of that," said the mother. "Fido doesn't make friends with every one, that is true."

Weeks passed, and the next-door neighbor had gradually established his footing with the Donaldsons, and had grown quite friendly. Mr. Donaldson remembered him as Captain Sage, grandfather of the little Miss Jenny, whose death had so overwhelmed an entire family, that it had driven them from their home and scattered them in far-away lands. Captain Sage had always been, "a little off," owing to a sunstroke during the Civil War, in a hot campaign under a fiercely beating southern sun; the loss of his favorite granddaughter had disturbed his mental equilibrium. But he was very harmless and kind, and it was a great comfort to him to mix up Jessica with Jenny. He evidently could not

THE TEMPTATION OF NOEL DENE

By L. G. MOBERLY

THE minister sat in his study alone. The room was small and bare. It contained nothing beyond the table, two or three chairs, and a bookcase. Even with books it was singularly ill furnished for a man of Noel Dene's scholarly attainments.

There were no small comforts or luxuries visible. Above the fireplace hung the only picture in the room—a beautiful photograph of Perugino's great "Crucifixion."

The eyes of the minister were fixed upon it now, as he sat by his table. He held a pen in his hand, but the ink upon it was dry; he had proceeded no further in the composition of his sermon than to write the text at the head of the paper:

"What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

The minister dropped his pen; a mist came over his eyes, hiding from his view the sunny garden, the many-colored hyacinths, the fluttering yellow butterfly.

That same fragrance of hyacinths had filled another garden, in which, sixteen years ago, he had asked Leonora Marten to be his wife. Sixteen years ago! He did not even need to shut his eyes to see her again as she had looked then, when she stood upon a smooth-shaven lawn beside a bed of hyacinths, and lifted a lovely, girlish face to his, as they plighted their troth; and now, the wife who had been his faithful companion through all the past years of struggle and poverty, lay upstairs in the bedroom that was over his study, smitten with a disease which the doctor feared was a mortal one.

He listened intensely to the sounds that came from overhead. Heavy footsteps passed to and fro across the floor; murmuring voices floated down to him from the window, which he knew was open beside her bed.

The doctors must have nearly finished their examination. In a few minutes he would know the worst.

The door opened—slowly; as the two doctors came into the room Noel Dene rose to receive them. His hand gripped the back of his chair; the face he turned to the two men was quite gray.

His attempt to frame a question with his dry lips proved a failure; but the question looked out of his eyes, and the old country practitioner, Dr. Bernard, came forward at once.

"I think we may be able to relieve your mind somewhat," he said kindly. "My friend, Dr. Samson, I am glad to say, differs from my view of your wife's case. He thinks that the trouble may be arrested; that her life may almost certainly be saved."

The tension of his listener's face relaxed; he breathed fervently the words: "Thank God!"

"Dr. Samson fears, however, that in order to do this an immediate operation is necessary."

"An operation?" A look of anguish again clouded Noel Dene's eyes, "is that—necessary?"

"I am afraid absolutely,"—the older doctor turned to the younger for confirmation of his words. "Dr. Samson will tell you what would, in his opinion, be your best course."

A great pity looked out of the young man's eyes, as they met the minister's stricken gaze.

"I am afraid," he said gently, "that an operation is the only possible chance of saving Mrs. Dene's life, but I am sure, that humanly speaking, it will be saved if the operation is done at once. I should advise you to send for Mr. Manders; there is no surgeon whom I could more confidently recommend for this particular case, which requires peculiar skill and knowledge. If I might suggest your talking it over with Mrs. Dene this morning and wiring to me your decision this afternoon, I could then, with Dr. Bernard's permission, see Mr. Manders, and make arrangements with him. I return to town this morning."

(From the Sunday Strand, London.)

Dr. Bernard nodded his acquiescence, and the younger man continued rapidly: "The operation should, if possible, be done to-morrow, or next day at the latest. I cannot answer for the consequences if it is unduly postponed."

The minister looked blankly into his face.

"Thank you," he said slowly, and as though speech was difficult to him. "I will talk it over with my wife, and will telegraph to you this afternoon."

The two doctors had left the room, and were already close to the front door, before Noel Dene's grip on the back of his chair relaxed, and he strode quickly after them.

"I forgot to ask you," he said hurriedly, "what are this great surgeon's charges for the operation? I ought to have remembered to ask you before."

The younger man turned back. "Mr. Manders' usual fee for this particular operation when done out of London is £150, in London it would only be £100, but to move Mrs. Dene is out of the question. I think I am right in saying £150."

"A hundred and fifty pounds?" Noel Dene repeated the words slowly, as though he were dreaming. "Thank you, I will think it over and let you know."

The young doctor bent forward.

"Remember, it is her life," he whispered earnestly, glancing up at that open bedroom window above him; "it sounds a big sum, I know, but the operation is a most difficult one, and its success means her life. It is worth any sacrifice."

"Yes, it is worth any sacrifice," the minister repeated mechanically; then he walked back to the study and shut the door.

"Worth any sacrifice? His wife's life worth any sacrifice?" He actually laughed as he re-seated himself in his chair and looked round the room. Yes, it was worth ten thousand sacrifices, but what had he to offer?

Nothing! Less than nothing! Nothing, nothing; and his wife's life hung in the balance.

A hundred and fifty pounds! Where could he get a hundred and fifty pounds? or, for the matter of that, fifty?

And it was his wife's life that hung in the balance; upon this operation depended her safety.

"Remember, it is her life," the young doctor had said.

Was it likely that he would forget, when his own life and joy were bound up in her?

"It is worth any sacrifice!" The words swung in his brain until their persistency irritated him.

Of course it was worth everything—everything; but—what sacrifice could he make? What sacrifice was equivalent to a hundred and fifty pounds? Why all the furniture of their house was not of that value! What—

The door opened; the old servant who was general factotum in the household, handed Mr. Dene a salver that held the second post letters.

"And when you are free, sir, the mistress says would you please to come up and speak to her?" she said.

Noel Dene gathered up the letters abstractedly.

"I will come directly," he answered, and was preparing to lay the letters upon the table, when one address, in an unknown hand, caught his attention.

Moved by a faint curiosity he opened it; in doing so a check fell from it to his feet. The note was short and to the point—

"GROSVENOR SQUARE, April 7.
"DEAR SIR:—Having seen your appeal for help in the restoration of your church (the magnificent architecture of which is well known to me) I beg to inclose £150 towards the very worthy object, which appeals strongly to me as an archæologist.
"Yours truly,
"JAMES DAVIES."

The letter fluttered to the floor. Noel Dene stooped and picked it and the check up together. Sitting down again heavily, he spread the check out upon the table and looked at it.

"Pay Noel Dene one hundred and fifty pounds." There it was in plain words before his eyes, and in the next instant the words were dancing in his brain. "Pay Noel Dene one hundred and fifty pounds."

They mingled themselves fantastically with some other words that had been swinging in his head before.

"It is worth any sacrifice; it is worth any sacrifice."

He smoothed the check under his fingers, and laughed softly.

Worth any sacrifice? Why! of course it was; it was her life, her life! If this man, this James Davies, this archæologist, whoever he might be, had known at what a moment his check would arrive, no doubt he would have suggested that it should be used to pay the great surgeon, and the restoration of the fine Norman church could wait just a little while.

Again he laughed softly, and patted the check. It felt like some live, warm thing under his fingers. That strip of paper meant so much! Why, when he came to think of it—it meant—everything; it meant his wife's life; his own happiness. At least, it would have meant all these things, if the check had been his own—to do what he liked with—his own!

He pushed it away from him. How ridiculous that such thoughts should come into his mind at all. Why, the check was in no sense his. It merely passed through his hands for the restoration of the church; it was no more his than—the church itself was his. Absurd! he would endorse it at once and send it to Mr. Maitland to pay into the fund, then—

But, after all, a little delay could make no real difference. A little delay only. He smoothed the check out again, there was actual tenderness in his touch. Well! supposing—only supposing—that he sent the check into his own account instead of to Mr. Maitland, the churchwarden; supposing, then, that he wrote a check himself for the great surgeon, and, later on—well! later on—he could repay the money into the Restoration Fund by instalments! No harm would be done, it would merely be a delay, and, if necessary, he could even pay interest on the money, to satisfy his instincts of honor. No harm would be done! Nothing could be really simpler—it was merely a matter of—of—deferred payment, ah! of course, that was it—deferred payment.

The fragrance of the hyacinths swept into the room again; and there shone before his eyes the remembrance of his wife's lovely, girlish face, that had been lifted to his on that April day sixteen years ago. It almost seemed to him as though she stood before him in the bloom of youth again; yet, now, her tired, worn face lay upon the pillows in the room overhead; her youth was over, she was dying—and he loved her more, a million times more, than he had loved her sixteen years ago. And—her life lay in his hands. He took up his pen, and, with a sudden movement of decision, turned the check over, and endorsed it quickly. It was all so simple—so extremely simple. He would post it early to his bank, saying it was to be paid into his account, then a telegram to Dr. Samson could be despatched at the same time.

"Fix operation for to-morrow," and the thing would be done.

On the other hand, if he followed his usual line of action with regard to subscriptions, he would send the check with a note direct to his churchwarden, Mr. Maitland, begging him to pay it into the Restoration Fund account.

If he did that, the telegram to Dr. Samson must run very differently.

"Operation out of the question."

It was no use to talk it over with Leonora; without the £150 the thing was impossible, yet—what was it Dr. Samson had said?

"I cannot answer for the consequences if it is unduly postponed. It is her life—it is worth any sacrifice."

Yes—yes—he entirely agreed; to save her life was worth any sacrifice. It was worth—

He drew a sheet of paper towards him. Upon it he wrote rapidly:

"LITTLE STRETTON, April 7.

"GENTLEMEN:—Will you be good enough to pay the enclosed check into my account? I am, yours faithfully,

"NOEL DENE."

"Yours faithfully!" would he be theirs or anybody else's "faithfully" ever again? He laughed harshly. The sound penetrated to the room above, and the sick woman stirred uneasily in her sleep. Pshaw! It was ridiculous; it was really quite simple, quite. He addressed the envelope firmly:

MESSRS. CHILDS AND CO.,
 1 FLEET STREET, E. C.

He laid the check within the letter, folding its ends carefully over the end of the paper in business wise. He folded the letter carefully too, and put it into the envelope, which he fastened down deliberately and sealed. Then he drew towards him a telegraph form, and, still firmly, he wrote Dr. Samson's address and the words, "Fix operation for to-morrow."

He pushed back his chair, and moved across the little room to ring the bell.

"It is worth any sacrifice," he said aloud. As he pushed his chair back from the table, his sheet of sermon paper fell to the floor, and he stooped mechanically to pick it up. In doing so, his own written words flashed before his eyes:

"Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" He stood with one hand upon the bell-rope, looking blankly at the sheet of paper in the other, whilst the words burnt themselves into his brain like letters of fire. "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

He drew back from the bell, and a long shiver ran through him. He snatched the telegraph form from the table, and tore it into fragments, stamping them under his feet. With a hand that shook he unfasted the letter to his bankers, and drew from it the check. He sat down at the table, and, though his hand trembled so that his writing was barely legible, he wrote another note, and folded the check into it, addressing the envelope quickly. He almost tottered across the room to the bell, and rang it violently.

"Tell John to take this note across to Mr. Maitland at once," he said.

The old servant had hardly left the room, before she again entered. She brought in a telegram upon a salver and put it into Noel's hand.

He opened it abstractedly, hardly even wondering what it could be about. His eyes saw the words, it is true; but for many seconds they conveyed no meaning to his dazed mind.

Then all at once he dropped his head on his arms and the hot tears coursed down his cheeks.

For these were the words of the telegram, sent by Dr. Samson from the station on his way to London:

"Took liberty of telegraphing to Manders. He will go to you to-morrow, if you wish. He remits all fees."

That Relieves Patients Quickly.

"My experience with food has been considerable.

For 20 years, I suffered with chronic indigestion, and bowel complaint which brought on general debility," says a gentleman of Danville, Ills. "I was very poor in flesh and every-thing I had consumed. I was treated by the best doctors of several cities, but to no benefit.

At last, I went to the hospital and while there began using Grape-Nuts, the physician giving me permission, and from that day I commenced to gain. By careful diet, and using judgment, I gained in flesh and strength, my lungs got better, and today I consider myself as well as men in general at my age of 60 years.

The other patients noticed that I gained faster under the same treatment and care and I told them to add Grape-Nuts to their diet and be careful not to eat meat, nor warm bread and starchy food. I can now eat anything in reason; I sleep well; bowels are regular and I have gained 22 pounds in flesh. Grape-Nuts food saved my life.

It adds to the health and comfortable living, makes the mind clear and prolongs life." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

VICTOR TALKING MACHINE

A Great Improvement

It's Here

Copyrighted 1902

A Big Step Ahead

Talking machines have made great advances within the last few years, and the Victor has been clear ahead of the rest—as its four-million-dollar business last year will show. But all the improvements that were ever made in all the talking machines put together (Victor included), don't compare with the last improvement in the Victor.

Our old-style Victor received the Gold Medal at the last great Exposition; but it wouldn't have, if the new style Victor (just out) had been there.

It is so much better, gives such perfect reproductions of music, song and speech, as to be almost beyond belief.

On exhibition and for sale by more than ten thousand stores throughout the United States.

FOUNDED IN THE PILGRIM DAYS

is a "mother of churches." From its loins sprang the Union Evangelical Church of Corona, L. I. (which was erected and founded by a member of the Newtown Church), and the Colored Church, on Union Avenue, Newtown, organized for the colored people of the district. In church organization work, the First Presbyterian has made an enviable record, and has proved itself a powerful factor for good; the Women's Missionary Society, Young Ladies' Auxiliary, and Christian Endeavor Society, being especially active and successful. The Sunday School, of which John H. Prall is Superintendent, has a roll of 432, all told, and is one of the largest on Long Island.

There are many features in the present celebration in the First Presbyterian Church at Newtown that are peculiarly appropriate in the case of an organization that has weathered the storms of two and a half centuries. Pastor Hendrickson and his associates arranged a programme, beginning Sunday forenoon, Oct. 26, with public worship in the old church, all the other meetings during celebration week being held in the new church. The latter building, which was begun in 1893 and dedicated in 1895, was the gift of Mr. J. G. Paynter, and cost altogether about $65,000. On the evening of October 26, among those announced to deliver addresses suitable to the occasion, were Rev. E. M. McGuffey (Episcopal), Rev. Chas. K. Clearwater (Reformed), Rev. H. W. McMaster (Methodist), Rev. Louis F. Sauerbrum (German Reformed), and Rev. W. J. Noble (Baptist). For Monday evening, October 27, a reception was announced, with a capital musical programme and addresses by Mr. Chas. D. Leverich, Professor J. D. Dillingham, and Dr. Hendrickson. On the following evening, a church service, with special music, greetings from Presbytery and addresses by Rev. W. J. Peck, of Corona, and Rev. Howard Duffield, Manhattan; Wednesday evening (topic: the Church in Foreign Lands), addresses by Rev. Kneeland P. Ketcham, Freeport, Rev. Arthur T. Brown, Secretary Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; Thursday evening (topic: the Church at Home), addresses by Rev. Lyman D. Calkins, Brooklyn, Rev. Charles L. Thompson, Secretary Presbyterian Board of Home Missions; Friday evening (topic: the Sunday School), addresses by Percy B. Bromfield, Hempstead, L.I., Rev. A. F. Schaffler, New York, and Hon. Seth Low, Mayor of New York; Sunday forenoon, November 2 (topic: A Day with Old Friends), appropriate addresses by Rev. John D. Wells, Brooklyn, Rev. Wm. W. Knox, New Brunswick, N. J.; Sunday afternoon, at Young People's Meeting, address by Rev. Geo. H. Payson, D.D., on "A Backward and Forward Glance"; address by Rev. H. W. McMaster: Sunday evening, addresses by Rev. Geo. H. Payson, D.D.; Rev. Jacob Mallmann, and the Pastor.

The present officers of the church are—Session: Rev. Wm. H. Hendrickson, John H. Prall, Coe F. Howard, and Gustave Haflinger. Deacons: J. W. Morgan, Thos. L. Proctor. Treasurer: James L. M. Hathaway. Trustees: Henry Blackwell, chairman, George W. Rey, Thomas E. Hardgrove, George L. Marshall, and John J. Scheper.

Such, in brief, is the story of a church whose birth goes back to the beginning of our nation's history, and whose services in the cause of Christ, in stress, struggle and persecution, should stimulate God's people everywhere. What eloquent appeals have echoed within its old walls, what joys and sorrows it has witnessed, and what Gospel triumphs it has celebrated! If the influence of a good act is felt around the globe, surely the spiritual influence of this venerable martyr-mother of churches should go out to the ends of the earth.

A Gallant Rescue in Mid-Ocean

A THRILLING story of dangers of the deep and timely help in hour of peril, which reaches this country from Europe, will hold special interest for readers of this paper, to whom the captain of the rescuing vessel is already known as a lifesaver.

CAPTAIN H. SPLIEDT

It will be recalled that years ago, when commander of a small schooner off Mazatlan, Mexico, Capt. Spliedt put off in a life-boat in raging seas one terrible night, and, at great personal peril, rescued Captain Struckmayer and his wife from the rigging of an American bark, which had gone to pieces on a rock. Those who already know the stirring career of the large-hearted and genial commander of the big ocean steamer, Pennsylvania, of the Hamburg-American Line, will be pleased to read the following account of how he lately saved thirteen more human beings from drowning.

The Norwegian bark Bothnia, carrying lumber from Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, to Swansea, Wales, damaged by hurricanes, her life-boats swept away, sprang a leak. All hands labored at the pumps night and day, but slowly and surely the sea rose higher and higher in the hold. An awful fate stared her crew in the face, and their only hope lay in aid from a passing steamer. Fourteen days the pumps were going, and no ship had appeared; the water was within an inch or two of the deck; but for her cargo of lumber, which helped to keep her afloat, the bark would already have gone to the bottom. The crew lashed a few logs together, got ready a supply of provisions and water, and prepared to commit themselves to the mercy of the deep, when in the far distance a great liner was sighted, hurrying eastward with her living freight and heavy cargo of merchandise. It was dusk. The distracted crew sent up rocket after rocket. Would she see them?

The lookout on the bridge of the ocean steamer fortunately saw the signaling bark and reported to Captain Spliedt, and in short order, the Pennsylvania, altering her course, was headed for the distressed vessel, approaching her as closely as safety permitted. Eager passengers, crowding the liner's deck, watched the lowering of the life-boats and their perilous journey over heavily rolling seas to the rapidly sinking Bothnia, and cheered their return with her officers and crew, who were welcomed on the Pennsylvania by her big-hearted captain. When they reached Plymouth, Cherbourg and Hamburg, they gave eloquent accounts of the rescue, and were loud in praises of Captain Spliedt and his officers, who had effected it under difficult and dangerous conditions.

THE FIGHTING PARSON

THE late Sheriff Samuel Freeman Pearson, widely known as "The Fighting Parson," was born in Roxbury, Mass., July 16, 1841. He was educated in the public schools at Roxbury and Chelsea. For Civil War service, he enlisted in the Fortieth Massachusetts Regiment. Twice he was offered a commission, and twice refused. He received life-long injuries; worse, he acquired a taste for alcohol, and went down into the depths. His graphic lecture, "Seven Years in Hell," was drawn from his own bitter experience. After he came to Portland, in 1872, he was taken from the gutter to the hall of the Reform Club, and, when sober enough, signed the "iron clad pledge," and made his first temperance speech: "Boys, I've signed the pledge, and while there's life in poor Pearson, he'll keep it."

Led by the prayer of his devoted wife, he knelt at the altar of the church on Chestnut street; and, after a mighty struggle, gave himself, soul and body, to the Lord and rose a knight for Christ. On the death of Osgood, the founder of the Reform Club, he became State President. Later, he was actively employed by the Y. M. C. A. In 1878, urged to open a Gospel Mission, he secured a hall, borrowed some seats, and with a dry-goods box for a platform, a wash-stand for a pulpit, and a borrowed Bible, his first meeting was held. Several conversions were reported; his purpose was formed, and the Mission was established. Next year he was ordained a minister of the Methodist Episcopal denomination. He was helped in his work by his wife. They held many meetings at various places in Massachusetts and Canada with marked success. Together for many years, as unpaid city missionaries, they worked for Portland's poor. Their Gospel Mission on Congress street has been a mighty power for good. The Sabbath services have been well attended year after year. Many tons of provisions and a vast amount of money and clothing have been dispensed through its agency to the poor. He preached their funerals, solemnized their marriages, and served in every way the poor to whom he ministered, and he made their Christmas times and Thanksgivings glad. The Mission building served as headquarters of the Prohibition party.

In 1886 Mr. Pearson went to Europe, where he had wonderful success, over 100,000 signing the pledge. He promised to return, but finding that General Dow felt his presence here necessary to the enforcement of the Maine Law, he cancelled his engagements there and devoted his attention to work at home. In 1900 he was elected Sheriff of Cumberland County, and at midnight, 1901, took the oath of office. On the first day he gathered his deputies around him, and offered an earnest prayer beseeching God's help and blessing. Two weeks later, his faithful wife and co-worker lay dying. As he knelt by her side clasping her hand, she murmured: "Be a good sheriff. Enforce the law and close the saloons." "God helping me, I will," was his answer. How he kept that vow, for the little more than a year remaining to him, has thrilled the whole country from circumference to centre, and is a matter of history. At the time of his death, August 6, he had been renominated to the office. Though full of official cares and burdens, he worked and prayed for his beloved mission. His assistant, Rev. Henry F. Dexter, succeeds the sainted founders, who have passed from labors more abundant to the rest that remaineth to the people of God.

MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

Pittsfield, Me.

ARE YOU AMBITIOUS? Coffee Makes Some People Helpless.

We inherit our temperaments. Some children are happy and bright, while others are nervous and cross. Care should be taken that the child is given proper food and drink so as not to increase natural nervousness or to bring it on; but this is often overlooked by mothers who permit their children to drink coffee without check.

The wife of a groceryman living in Siloam, Mo., says: "I was born with a nervous temperament, and this was increased by my parents giving me coffee when a child, unconscious of its bad effect upon my nervous system. In time, a cup of coffee in the morning invariably soured on my stomach, and a single cup at night would make me nervous and wakeful and often cause a distressing heartburn. Last year I laid in bed all summer with nervous prostration, a complete wreck from coffee drinking. I craved a good, nourishing not drink and commenced to use Postum Food Coffee.

There was a gradual improvement in my health almost from the commencement of using Postum. I could sleep well, the heartburn and nervousness disappeared, my stomach trouble stopped, and now (a year later) I have gone from the sick-bed into the store behind the counter day after day: from a helpless to a stirring business woman, with new life and strength, new hopes and ambition; from the pale, weak 102-pound woman to my present weight of 120 pounds. Thanks to Postum.

We carry Postum in stock and recommend it to our customers; we love to sell it and often give a trial quantity to the faltering to induce them to use this health-giving drink." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

SOCIAL LIFE IN CUBA . .

against this evil eye. Some of them would laugh at their own superstition, yet they would not put away the charm or the amulet. The evil eye also was the one thing the bandits used to fear, when they were not afraid of the Spanish police.

There is among the Cubans a tradition, which is almost a superstition, that the rays of the moon have a peculiar effect upon sleepers in the tropical climate, and that even waking persons should never go with bared heads. Time and time again, in admiring the skies on a clear, moonlight night, I have had Cuban friends hastily replace my hat, unconsciously removed by me. "It is bad, very bad," they would say. They seek to protect themselves against the rays of the moon. On absolutely clear nights, with not a drop of moisture in the air, I have seen Cubans with their umbrellas raised. One moonlight night, last winter, in the village of Guanajay, I was telling an American friend of this peculiarity. A few blocks down the street some one passed with the upraised umbrella, but the American was not willing to take my word for the reason. A few weeks later, in Mantanzas, on a night which was remarkable for its clear, moonlit beauty, he saw exactly the same thing and was convinced.

Now, this tradition, like many superstitions, has a basis. In the tropics, the heat radiates rapidly, and the nights frequently are quite cold. The change is almost too great, and the night air is bad, so that it is well to be covered. But the moon itself is not the cause, and it does not take men crazy in the tropics, any more than in the temperate climates.

A Faithful Worker

THIRTY-EIGHT years of service as a Sabbath School teacher—during twenty-five of which not one Sabbath's attendance was missed, rain or shine—is

MISS MARGARET ROSCH

Miss Margaret Rosch's record of Christian work. Recently, her church, the Bethany Presbyterian, Newark, N. J., celebrated the anniversary which marked for this milestone in her life of pious labors. Her pastor, Rev. E. A. McFarland, the officers, teachers and members of congregation and Sunday School, gathered about her to tender congratulations, and to render thanks. A handsome eight-day clock was presented as a testimonial, Elder William Turner making the address. A reminiscent discourse was given by Elder George W. Baldwin, of the First Presbyterian Church. It was said she might indeed be called the founder of her Church, since the Sunday School, which preceded it, grew out of a class which she organized, and the Church out of that. She has now a large Bible class of young women.

The Lord's Prayer in Outline

A reader of this journal, Mr. I. F. Jacks, of Buffalo, N. Y., has arranged the Lord's Prayer in a novel form, showing its various parts classified or analyzed. It will prove serviceable to teachers and students in Sunday Schools. It is as follows:

- A) THE INVOCATION:
Our Father who art in heaven.
- B) THE SEVEN PETITIONS:
(a) FOR GOD'S GLORY
1. Hallowed be thy name.
2. Thy kingdom come.
3. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.
(b) FOR EARTHLY THINGS
Give us this day our daily bread.
(c) FOR OUR OWN SOUL
1. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.
2. And lead us not into temptation.
3. But deliver us from evil.
- C) THE DOXOLOGY
For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

Fairy Plate Calendar Free

The new Fairy Plate Calendar for 1903 is the handsomest, as well as the most unique and artistic Calendar conception of the year. It consists of five separate pieces made up in the form of hand painted plates. The first plate bears the year's Calendar, while the other four are perfect reproductions of Royal Vienna china with beautiful heads by Ryland (the celebrated English painter) as a central feature. The plates are reproduced in twelve colors and gold, with the centers counter sunk and the borders embossed. Each plate is complete in itself and is ready for hanging. The character of the subjects and the exquisite manner in which they are reproduced makes these plates extremely valuable for decorative purposes. The Calendar and set of Art Plates would retail for at least $1.00.

Size of Each Plate, 9 1/2 Inches in Diameter

We will send you this beautiful Fairy Plate Calendar for ten Oval Fairy Box Fronts. Fairy Soap is the best and purest white Soap that money can buy. It is made from the choicest selected materials and is delightfully refreshing for the toilet and bath. Fairy Soap is oval in shape; fits every hand, fit for any hand. Fairy Soap costs but five cents at all grocers. Each cake wrapped and packed in a separate box.

If you prefer, instead of sending us the ten Oval Fairy Box Fronts, you may forward us ten two-cent stamps, giving full name and address and we will immediately mail the Calendar to you postpaid.

NATIONAL PERVERSITY

An Era of Hebrew History Characterized by Frailty

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHENEVER there is a want of thoroughness in the life of a child of God, open sin is sure to follow; anything tolerated which is known to grieve the Spirit of God, gives Satan a right of way into our lives, and he is not slow to profit by the advantage gained. From what seems a little unfaithfulness he leads on to open sin.
During the early period of Israel's occupation of Palestine, the tolerated Canaanites kept up idolatry in the land; and though at first they were subject and tributary to Israel, they soon became their teachers in idolatry.

The people served the Lord as long as they were under a good influence—while Joshua lived, and those who had seen the great works of the Lord (Josh. 24: 31; Jud. 2: 7). "And there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the work which he had wrought for Israel" (Jud. 2: 10).
They might have known him. They had the part of the Word of God which was the life-power of Joshua; but, like the generation in which we live, they did not give heed to the Word of the Lord. It is a dreadful thing to say, but it is true, that there are few books which are in general use the entire contents of which are less known than those of our Bibles.
We meet continually with people who have no idea where to turn for passages which they hear quoted, and who have been so accustomed to hear certain portions read or preached from that they know no others, and have consequently a maimed Bible. They believe they are converted, and yet some of them have never really read the Bible—which is bread for their inner life—right through. No wonder, then, that they easily become a prey.

No less than eight times do we read in the Book of Judges that the children of Israel
"did evil in the sight of the Lord"—this very people whom he had chosen to be "a holy people," "a special people to himself," a "peculiar people," whom he called "his inheritance." But the people trifled with sin, not apprehending that they were playing with edged tools: and at last God's threat had to be carried out. They "forsook the Lord";
he could no longer deal with them as a people who were in his favor—he could not countenance sin. They who had been separated from the nations by the presence of God amongst them, despised this distinction, and "followed other gods, the gods of the people that were round about them, and bowed themselves down unto them; and they provoked the Lord to anger." What could he do? "He delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them, and sold them (Deut. 32: 30) into the hands of their enemies round about, so that they could no longer stand before their enemies. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as the Lord had spoken, and as the Lord had sworn unto them, and they were sore distressed" (Jud. 2: 11-15).

What was the inducement which led Israel into such degeneracy and degradation? The crucial point was that it cost them too much to be a separate people. Human nature loves to be popular, to stand well with man. A boy at school will go against his tastes and against his conscience rather than be unpopular with his schoolmates. The secret of the worldly Christianity of this day springs from the same root; the dread of being peculiar and losing ground with man. There is but one power which can stand against this instinct of fallen man: it is love. When "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given us" (Rom. 5: 5). God becomes supreme in our hearts; and the fear of being unpopular ceases to exist; it no longer costs us anything to know that "the world knoweth us not because it knew him not" (1 John 3: 1).
The test of the heart's love to God is the place he holds over our affections; if he is not first with us we do not truly love him.

The people groaned under their oppression, and God had mercy, and "raised up judges which saved them out of the hands of them that spoiled them." But there was no heart-whole repentance; "they hearkened not unto their judges," but hankered after their false gods. A repentance which is merely the result of a desire to get rid of the consequences of sin is not permanent. "Whenever God sent them a judge the Lord was with the judge, and saved them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge." But God worked through an intermediary, he did not manifest himself as of old. He was withdrawing his presence more and more as the people went further and further from him.
When the judge was dead they went further still into sin, and "dealt more corruptly than their fathers."

At last things came to a crisis, and God said, "Because this nation have transgressed my covenant . . . I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died; that by them I may prove Israel whether they will keep the way of the Lord to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it or not." So the Lord left those nations.

SHREDDED WHEAT BISCUIT

It is the wheat, the whole wheat, and nothing but the wheat. It is a Naturally Organized Food, that is, contains all the properties in correct proportion necessary to nourish every element of the human body. "Soft cooked" cereals are swallowed with little or no mastication and, therefore, the teeth are robbed of their necessary—NATURAL—exercise, causing weakness and decay. Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit being crisp, compels vigorous mastication and induces the NATURAL flow of saliva which is necessary for NATURAL digestion. Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit builds Strong Bodies and Sound Teeth, and makes possible the Natural Condition of Health.

first finding out the weight and height. Pictures of Oak Heaters look very much alike but the weight and height indicate the true value. This is important, for weight denotes the quality of a stove and height adds to its attractiveness, therefore it is to your interest to get the heaviest and highest heater for your money that you can.

Our heaters as enumerated above, all made and finished like the illustration, with fire-resisting castings of special mixed pig iron, solid one-piece air-tight sunk bottom ash pit, large ash pan, ash-pit door, air-tight screw draft, heavy corrugated cast iron fire-pot, large handsome fire-pot ring cemented and bolted to top and fire-pot stretched over cast flanges making the drum air tight, mounted with 18 gauge smooth steel and heavy never-wear-out castings, fitted with nickel swing top ring, nickel door latch, hinge pins and knobs, 3 nickel foot rails, nickel register in ash-pit door, nickel name plate and handsome spun brass urn. Important features are cooking lids under swing top, check damper in pipe collar and feed door, and shake and draw center grate for coal and wood.

PERSONAL CHRISTIANITY*

The Individuality of the Gospel Offer of Salvation

NOT a theory, not a system of theology or philosophy is the religion of Christ, but a vital, personal union with him. It was not as a teacher that Christ came, though his teaching was the highest the world has ever heard; it was not as a miracle-worker, though his miracles were the most wonderful in history; it was as a Saviour. That was his special mission, to which all other elements of his character and work were contributory. He came to deliver men from the dominion of sin and to impart to them the power to live a holy life. It is obvious that this mission could not be to the masses; no populace, no congregation can be converted in bulk. A whole nation may call itself Christian; every man and woman in it may be baptized; its legislature may enact laws requiring church attendance and Christian observance; the strictest kind of religious life may be made compulsory, and yet the nation may be without real Christianity. The religion of Christ deals with the individual, not with the group or mass.

The conditions go deeper still. The individual cannot become a Christian by outward observance. He may be baptized, and yet not be a Christian, though every Christian will be careful that in his case his Lord's command to be baptized has been obeyed. He may be regular in church attendance, in partaking of the Lord's supper, in regular Bible reading, and in prayer, and yet not be a Christian. Christianity goes deeper than all that. A man becomes a Christian when his nature, his disposition, his desires are akin to those of Christ. He must become like Christ, a Christly man, to be a Christian. And yet it is often a man very far removed in heart and life from that ideal who is welcomed into the kingdom. The dying thief probably was not at all that kind of man; but he was a Christian in embryo, and that is the most that can be said of nearly every man whom Christ accepts. It is his power that changes human nature. The line is crossed when the man gives himself into Christ's hands, to be transformed. When that surrender comes from the heart, when there is no reserve, when it is utter and complete, then he belongs to Christ, and the cleansing, purifying, elevating influence begins to work upon him.

But are not repentance, faith and sanctification necessary? The first two are implied in self-surrender. If the man did not deplore his sins and desire to be delivered from them, he would not come to Christ, for sin and Christ can have no association. If he did not have that confidence in the power and willingness of Christ, which we call faith, he would not commit his soul to Christ's keeping. Sanctification follows surrender. Those who expect it to precede surrender, who wait to become better and more worthy of him before they come to him do not come at all. The sick man does not wait to become better before he commits his case to his physician. The invitation is not to righteous men, but to sinners, to those who are in the grip of sin and long for deliverance. This it is that gives Christianity its surpassing power. It takes the individual in his bonds and sets him free; then it heals him, cleanses him and clothes him. The story is told of a man, under the influence of liquor, entering a temperance meeting and declaring himself a teetotaler. He was derided, and the cry was raised to turn him out. But he explained: "I signed the pledge an hour ago; I am a teetotaler, but I am weak, and I have come here for help and safety. Where should I go if not here?" That is the principle of Christianity. The convert's first act is the decisive one, and Christ takes him and proceeds to make the best of him that can be made. Thus the responsibility of every soul is fixed. There is no excuse. If a man desires to be a Christian, he is not kept back by his sin. Christ's sacrifice avails for him personally, and he has only to make personal surrender in order to become a Christian.

DR. JOHN G. PATON, OF THE NEW HEBRIDES

DR. JACOB CHAMBERLAIN, OF INDIA

TWO ILLUSTRIOUS MISSIONARY VETERANS

NEWS comes from the New Hebrides, that Dr. John G. Paton, the veteran missionary, is once more back in his beloved field of labor after his long tour in Christian lands. From India, we learn that Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, that other venerable servant of Christ, has arrived among his people, who have given him enthusiastic welcome on his return from his native land. It is pleasant to look on the photograph of these two veterans, which was secured by Dr. A. T. Pierson, Editor of The Missionary Review of the World, during their recent visit here. Separated as they now are by so immense a distance, dealing with heathenism in so different manifestations, yet one in heart, with the same implicit faith in the one remedy for the world's sin and sorrow, and with the same loyal devotion to the Divine Master, whom they have both served so nobly through a long life, it was well that they should have met to cheer one another on earth before going to receive their reward above. Dr. Paton is seventy-eight years of age, and has been a missionary forty-four years; Dr. Chamberlain is sixty-seven years of age, and has been forty-three years in the service. Both spoke at the Ecumenical Council in New York with enthusiasm of their work, and both testified that as the end of life approached, they rejoiced that they had given their years to the service of Christ. There were no regrets over opportunities of social distinction that had escaped them while they were toiling in foreign lands; but a great joy that God had used them in his kingdom, and a great eagerness to make their remaining years an offering on his altar.

Dr. Chamberlain is an American, and Dr. Paton a Scotchman, but both of them come of families ardently devoted to Christ and deeply interested in foreign missions. Dr. Chamberlain, in the course of some personal reminiscences, said: "I drank in the spirit of missions on my mother's breast. That sainted mother was the instrument of sending out eleven of her sons and daughters, nephews and nieces, into the foreign field. I had, in young manhood, so taken in the spirit of missions that though my course in life seemed to have been definitely settled, and it had never occurred to me that I should be a missionary, I remember distinctly vowing a most solemn vow to my Master,

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Answered in Present Issue

How can I have the absolute inward assurance that my sins are forgiven? How is the assurance of forgiveness communicated to the individual soul?

Answers to Question of the Week

Perfect Surrender Brings Assurance

The absolute inward assurance of forgiveness is to be obtained by a perfect surrender of our lives to God. If this is done in prayer, and without one reservation, the Holy Ghost performs its part as surely as God's promises stand. There is an expansion, an uplifting, an inward illumination, a rapturous exaltation that ever after establishes an assurance of forgiveness of sin to the individual soul. It is "the Spirit witnessing with our spirit that we are the sons of God." This is the new birth.

ALICE C. BOYNTON.

Complete Submission Gives Assurance

The absolute conviction will be found in your own heart after you have questioned it and can truthfully say with me these words: "I believe in, and love the Lord Jesus Christ, enough to lay down my life, if need be, for his sake. I love him well enough, to live as long as he wants me to, a life of idleness or of labor, a life in prison or a life of freedom, a life of suffering or a life free from all care, a life wholly devoid of companionship, wealth, worldly pleasures and friends. I love him well enough to go down to my grave, if need be, branded by the world. I believe in and love Jesus well enough to suffer in silence all these things to shield others, or because of my own unworthiness; to open not my mouth because of persecutions in his name." When you can sign your name freely to such a pledge, then you will feel the blessed peace enter your heart, and God will come and talk with you.

MARIE BROADBENT.

Three Ways in Which Assurance Comes

Such processes cannot be analyzed, but we may give a few hints as to the method whereby assurance comes. 1. The Word of God is received and believed. It becomes a living word to the soul. Through it we come to know ourselves and God. Its promises concerning assurance are all sufficient. 2. The Holy Spirit "witnesseth with our spirits that we are children of God." This is assurance. 3. The experiences of others. God ever uses such witnesses. By these and many other ways God brings the soul into a state of rest, peace, trust, holy desire, real joy, and deep love, and all the fruits of the Spirit, so that the believer is as sure of salvation as of his own existence.

W. J. MOSIER.

It is According to our Faith

This assurance of God's forgiveness of sins is given in answer to prayer through Jesus, and is communicated to our souls by the Holy Spirit. The degree or clearness of this assurance is according to our faith. Doubts cloud this consciousness of God's favor. The Holy Spirit imparts to the believer an assurance of pardon and adoption into God's family. "Ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself."

S. F. E.

The Faith of a Child

A little boy applied for admission to the church. The pastor asked him if he thought he was a Christian. "I do not think so, I know it," he answered. A good elder looked up, surprised. He had thought the boy was too young to understand what he was doing; now he thought this was presumption. The pastor asked him how he knew it. "Because God says so," was the reply, and there was more surprise. "What do you mean by that?" he was asked. "God says, 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' I have confessed my sins to him and I know he has forgiven them because he says so, and so I am a Christian." (See I. John 1: 9, and 5: 13; Rom. 8: 16; John 3: 36, and 5: 24, and 6: 47). "Hath everlasting life." That means now; not that I shall have when I die or some time in the future.

OLIVER HEMSTREET.

The Conditions are Plain and Simple

God gives us certain conditions, so plain and simple that we cannot misunderstand them; and says if we fulfil these conditions, if we repent and accept Christ, we shall be saved. There is no doubt about it. God cannot break a promise. If my mother says she will do a certain thing for me, I know she will if it is in her power. Shall I not believe my Saviour when he says if I come unto him he will in no wise cast me out? We also know our sins are forgiven when "old things have passed away and all things have become new"; when we hate what we once loved, and love what we hated. Paul says also, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." If we know the voices of our friends here, should we not also know God's voice? If we do our part, God is sure to do his.

E. L. M.

see the bridge over which the train is safely carrying us. So faith saves, though we may not feel safe. The second step is to trust oneself to Christ, as a child lets his father take him in his arms. The third step is to willingly do and bear whatever Christ imposes.

SPECIMEN ILLUSTRATION

THE TIMBREL

Timbrel, tabret (Heb. toph). In old English, tabret was used for any drum. Tabret and tabourne are diminutives of tabour, and denote the instrument now known as the tabourine. Tabret is a contraction of tabourin. The Hebrew toph is undoubtedly the instrument described by travelers as the diff or diff of the Arabs. It was played principally by women, Ex. 15: 20; Judges 11: 34; I. Sam. 18: 6; Ps. 68: 25, as an accompaniment to the song and dance. The diff of the Arabs is described by Russell as "a hoop (sometimes with pieces of brass fixed in it to make a jingling) over which a piece of parchment is stretched. It is beaten with the fingers, and is the true tympanum of the ancients." In Barbery it is called tar.

The Holy Spirit Gives It

God "that cannot lie" says through the inspired apostle, "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." When the conditions are fully met, faith springs up in the human heart, and to believe "that my sins are forgiven" is without effort, the same as to breathe. It is the work of the Holy Spirit to communicate this assurance of forgiveness to the individual soul. How it is done is a great mystery. Christ said to Nicodemus, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

KATE H. BOOTH.

Doubtfuls Can Never Enjoy It

Some obtain "absolute inward assurance" of sins forgiven more readily than others. Some souls are most trustful. The doubting and despondent may never in this life have assurance "absolute," yet even these may possess "assurance." The first step to "absolute assurance" is to believe that it is not assurance that saves, but faith. We may not

Robert L. P. Ossining, N. Y. From the tone of the articles in the London newspapers concerning Piggott's doctrines, it would appear that his sermons were of the visionary, impractical order, regardless of orthodoxy and such as might be expected of a man of erratic or unbalanced mind.

D. B. S., Kalona, Ia. In Gen. 2: 5, 6, we are told that there was no rain, but a mist, which covered the earth and watered it. Scientists believe that this condition lasted until the Flood, and that the sun did not penetrate the vapory envelope, until after the great precipitation of waters which transformed the earth's atmospheric surroundings. The first rainbow, therefore, could not have appeared until after the Flood.

SEND FOR YOURS EARLY

We believe there is not a man, woman or child, the wide world over, who is not at heart a lover of fine pictures—an admirer of what is really chaste, beautiful and exquisite in art. You, dear reader, are not an exception. This year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after months of careful research, has succeeded in securing, at a very large expenditure, a genuine artistic surprise for its family of readers, that will give everyone unexpected pleasure. We have prepared a grand

FAMILY ART GALLERY

Consisting of Ten Magnificent Art Panels and Ovals in Colors

And it is our purpose to send a full set of these superb pictures Free, to every subscriber, making no exceptions. We are resolved that this pleasure shall be shared by all alike, and that these Gems of the Painter's Art shall gladden and adorn every Home in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a regular weekly visitor.

Let us tell you something about these ten famous Paintings, which form, in the highest sense, a representative Ten Famous Masterpieces "Home Gallery of the Fine Arts." In the first place, they are authentic reproductions of ten of the World's Great Masterpieces. Together, the originals represent a large fortune. Four of the ten are taken from the four leading paintings of the finest collection in America—that of the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art. Three originals of these four, namely, Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair," Schreyer's "Arab Warriors" and Schenck's "Lost Sheep" are valued at $86,000. In all of these, and in every picture in this priceless collection—which embraces a range of subjects wide enough to suit all tastes—the reproductions, all in fine canvas finish, preserve the vivid coloring, the free atmosphere, the brilliancy and freshness, and all the fine qualities of the originals, to such an extent that they may be truthfully said to be replicas, with all the beauty and charm of the painter's art retained in highest perfection. Any one of the ten pictures will make a beautiful and appropriate Christmas gift. We are sending the entire set free to every subscriber, all charges prepaid.

Now, we have a full set of these Art Panels and Ovals for you—a Complete Family Art Gallery, especially for your home decoration, but we would counsel you to send for it at once. We give this advice solely for your own benefit, as even with all our care and forethought, the supply may not meet the demand. As we go to press with this edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it is quite evident, even working with all facilities at highest pressure, that our lithographers will hardly be able to produce more of these beautiful Family Art Galleries than were originally promised us for delivery by a certain date. We want you to get yours early. By acting now, all delays and disappointments will be avoided, and every subscriber can receive this exquisite Art Collection in good time and in fine condition.

We are particularly anxious that all should be sent out to our subscribers before the great avalanche of holiday mail business begins, when deliveries are frequently subject to unavoidable, though provoking delays. We urge you, therefore, in your own interest, to assist us in taking advantage of prompt, early and safe delivery of these beautiful Art Ovals and Panels, by sending in your subscription now. And when the Family Art Gallery comes to hand, and you have examined it, and fully admired its wonderful merits, kindly write us a postal, saying how you like it, and which of the ten Masterpieces is your favorite work of art.

PROGRESS IN THE REALM OF THE SHAH

NOW that the Shah of Persia, having visited the leading European capitals, and witnessed the grandeur of the coronation festivities in London, has returned to his own capital, it may be expected that Persian society, or at least the portion of it that stands nearest to the throne, will soon begin to experience the effects of that memorable visit. Unlike some of his predecessors, the present Shah is a ruler of progressive ideas. His acquaintance with the world has convinced him—no doubt much against the will of certain of his official advisers—that ancient Iran is pretty much behind the age in many things. He has already instituted some startling innovations since his return. The royal automobile, operated by an imported chauffeur, whizzes along the quiet highways at Teheran, to the consternation of the old-fashioned Persians, who see in it an omen of greater changes to come. There is talk of extensive improvements at the capital, and one need not be astonished soon to learn of many modern innovations that will still further shock the Shah's conservative subjects.

But while, on the surface, changes may take place, it will require generations to effect any appreciable transformation in the manners and customs of the Persian people, as a whole. Take their domestic affairs as illustration. When a new home is to be built, a high wall is first erected round the chosen site, so that no one can see from without what goes on within the courtyard. Parallel to this outer wall is raised a second wall, eight or twelve feet in height, and between these two walls are partitioned off the dwelling rooms, so that all the doors and windows are on one side and open, not as ours do, chiefly to the front, but on to the courtyard, which often has the appearance of a garden, for all Persians are very fond of flowers.

A Persian, whether well-to-do or poor, rises at dawn. He begins the day with prayer, and, after a cup of tea, he proceeds to the fields or to the shop. It is about ten o'clock when he sits down in his place of business to partake of breakfast, consisting of some bread and a little sour milk, which is brought to him on a tray. In summer, the hot hours of mid-day are devoted to sleep, after which, according to his social standing, the Persian either devotes himself to calling on his friends or returns to his labors until sunset. The principal meal of the day he takes at home with his family, after nightfall, and in the open court of the house or on the roof. The cloth is spread on the floor, round which are laid long, flat cakes of pebble bread, which do double duty as food or plates. The meal consists of meat, principally mutton, a great deal of rice, and many savory dishes. When the time comes to retire, the bed-clothes, which have been wrapped in a cloth and set against the wall to make a sort of couch, are turned over and spread upon the floor. Except among the rich, about half a dozen persons occupy the same apartment. The rooms are illuminated by lamps or tallow candles. When guests are expected, the supper does not take place until nearly midnight. On such occasions, the men and women do not meet together.

The social entertainments of the women consist in feasting, eating candies, in gossip, and watching professional dancers. The reading of the Persian poets sometimes forms part of the evening's amusement. The entertainments of the men are feasting, smoking and drinking sherbet. To help amuse guests and pass the time, musicians are generally called in, of whom one plays on a stringed instrument, one sings, and the other beats time on a kind of drum, consisting of an earthenware framework, shaped something like a huge egg-cup covered with parchment.

Both men and women in Persia are extremely particular about their personal appearance. A great deal of time is spent by all classes in the public baths. A genuine Persian of the old school does not think himself fit to appear in public till his beard has been dyed and his finger-nails, and sometimes his fingers, stained. As he walks on the street, he might pass his own wife without recognizing her, so completely do the Persian women conceal themselves in their outdoor garb. A dark blue cloak, made either of cotton or silk, envelops the head and body, and a long white linen veil completely covers the face, in which is only a small worked grating through which the eyes of the women appear. They wear large baggy trousers, each leg of which terminates in a sock for the foot. The trousers are usually made of green silk.

A lady correspondent, writing from Tabreez to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, thus describes a Persian wedding:

On the day after my betrothal, the guests began to arrive at the home of my uncle, where I lived. When I heard of their coming I went away to the vineyard. To appear a little lascivious and timid on such occasions is accounted a great virtue. I did not return home till the evening, and, as I retired to my room, I could see the guests, most of whom were old men, with long, flowing beards, sitting on the floor and taking their supper while they discussed the formalities of the coming ceremony.

A few minutes afterwards there came into the room two serious looking old ladies and stood near where I was sitting. One of the two ladies very solemnly said: "The elders have sent us to you with this ring (as she spoke she held the ring between her thumb and index finger, so that it might be seen by all who were present). If you are willing to accept this man as your husband, then take the ring and put it on your finger."

I took the ring, hesitatingly, and when I had put it upon my finger, the old lady said, turning to the people present, "Do you see and witness it, all of you?" They all said, "Yes." Then she said, "God bless this ring."

During the time that passes between the formal engagement and the wedding, the bridegroom has to steal such visits as he can pay to his intended, and he generally makes friends with some relatives or friends of the bride to arrange these meetings. It is understood that the young lady will never be alone with her intended. It is the custom of the country that the bridegroom has to provide the bridal dress and bear all the expenses in connection with the wedding dinner.

It is an immemorial practice for Persian wedding guests to steal any light and portable things that they can lay hands on in the bride's home or native village—such as tea-cups, knives and spoons, and even chickens. Two of the men who formed my wedding escort, had tied to their saddles sixteen hens.

The marriage ceremony was performed by the bridegroom's uncle, and it lasted more than an hour and a half. During all this time the unfortunate best man had to remain standing. The engagement ring was put in a glass of mingled water and wine, which was blessed by the pastor and then drunk by the bride and bridegroom.

Such are some of the time-honored social customs of Persia which, even with the most progressive ruler, could not be eradicated in many years.

Three Languages

LUKE 23: 38:

"And a superscription also was written over him in letters of Greek and Latin and Hebrew. This is the King of the Jews"

CAPITAL punishment has been in vogue among all nations, both civilized and barbaric. But of all modes of capital punishment, whether by the hangman's noose, or by decapitation, or slow strangulation, or by burning at the stake, the most horrible way for any criminal to die is by the crucifixion mode—that form of public execution which was practised among the Jews. Yet we see Christ as a common criminal, hanging upon the Cross and dying by the most intense and agonizing form of suffering, mental and physical.

But though Jesus Christ is dying upon the Cross as a common criminal, there is one vivid distinction which singles his death out from among all the crucifixions. That exception is the style of the superscription nailed above the Cross. It was customary among the Jews to place above the heads of the dying a written statement descriptive of the crimes for which they were being executed. But instead of declaring that Jesus Christ was dying an ignominious death for the sin of murder, or of blasphemy, or of insurrection against the throne of Caesar, the board over the head of Christ had written upon it, in three different languages, this one striking sentence: "This is the King of the Jews." Even in his degradation, humiliation, and death, God seems to have so ordered events that the very man who condemned him to death should have acknowledged his royalty, and thus proclaimed to all the generations of all times the great purpose for which Christ was born as a babe in Bethlehem of Judea, for which he lived as a boy in Nazareth, and for which he died upon the Cross for the salvation of men.

Let me describe how the three languages—the Greek, the Latin, and the Hebrew—which were united in the superscription upon the Cross, are symbolic of the universality of Christ's reign.

The Language of Scholars

Greek was the language of learning. In that realm our Divine Saviour is king—Lord of the intellect besides being ruler of the heart. He is to be the dominating power in our great universities and institutions of learning, as well as in our Christian Endeavor Societies and humble meeting-houses in the backwoods. He is to be the companion of the scientist, like Henry Drummond, who goes forth into the great Temple of Nature to find "A Natural Law in the Spiritual World," as well as the companion of David Livingston, whose greatest ambition was to tell the simple story of the Nativity to the ignorant black man living among the African swamps or upon the banks of the Congo. He is to be the inspiration of Hugh Miller's geological crowbar, and Agassiz' laboratory, and Isaac Newton's scientific instruments, and William Herschel's telescope, as well as the hope of the poor young girl dying in the springtime of youth who accepts him as "the evidence of things not seen." The superscription must be in Greek, because Christ has a mission to the learned, the cultured, the refined. The Greek language has always been the symbol of culture and refinement. It is the language of the poet and sculptor, and architect and musician, and philosopher and statesman. It is the language of intellectuality, because in the time of Christ it was exclusively the tongue of the literati, as the French language during the nineteenth century was the Court language of all Europe. So, in the Greek superscription written over the Cross, in symbol, Christ seems to say: "The Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ shall successfully appeal to the intellectual man as well as to the ignorant, to the calm, cold, carefully-weighing, scientific mind, as well as to the impulsive love of the little child."

But though the superscription over the Cross had the sentence, "This is the King of the Jews," written in the Greek language, there are thousands and tens of thousands of infidel scoffers who continually sneer at Christ's name, and at the "Word of God." They pretend to think that the religion of the Lord Jesus never appeals to the brain. They assert that the Gospel is only a relic of the superstitious and barbaric ages, fit only for shallow, effeminate men, sentimental women, and sick children. They affirm that the Bread of Life is only good for the one purpose of being rolled up into small, harmless pellets, to be fed to invalids to calm their nerves when they are very sick or hopelessly dying. These scoffing infidels seem able to study every science and law, calmly and deliberately and intelligently, and yet are not able to intelligently investigate the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. These scoffers, who refuse to read the Greek superscription over the Cross, are, to a great extent, in the mental condition in which the French infidel, Duroc, lived. One day, when he was making a bitter attack upon the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, and sneering at it as a Gospel fitted only for the ignorant and superstitious, Napoleon Bonaparte turned to him and said, "Duroc, I am much surprised at your statements. You seem to be an intelligent man, and yet you shut your eyes to every one of the evidences of Christianity. Though you charge Christians with being unreasonable in their beliefs, you yourself are so unreasonable that you are willing to accept any theory and believe any absurdity, as long as it is not found in the Bible." Such is the mental and spiritual conditions of many of those men who will not read the Greek superscription over the Cross.

Illustrious Disciples

If the Bible does not satisfy the intellect, how can you account for the fact that it has commanded the admiration of the greatest thinkers of the ages? If this Book, which acclaims Christ, does not bear the investigation of the mind, how was it that Sir William Jones, the greatest linguistic human encyclopaedia who ever lived, once said, in reference to that Bible, "I have carefully and regularly perused the scriptures, and am of the opinion that this Book, independent of its divine origin, contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence than can be collected from all other books, no matter in what language they may have been written." If Christ's Bible does not appeal to the brain, how can you account for the fact that Thomas Carlyle, a great intellectual leader of the English-speaking world, whose dyspeptic stomach made him chronically growl at everybody and everything, once declared that the book of Job was the finest prose poem ever written; or that Lord Jeffrey, the hard-headed critic of the Edinburgh Review always carried in his side pocket Saint John's Apocalypse, because he felt that it was a masterpiece of literature. Ah, those testimonies do not tend to prove that Christ only influences the ignorant and the mentally superstitious.

If this Bible does not appeal to the brain, how is it that science and revelation, by the statements of the Bible, are daily becoming more and more harmonized? As intelligent men, do you not know that though the scientists have for centuries been squabbling, these differences are gradually passing away, and that science and revelation are coming into closer and more harmonious relations in regard to many things whereon they formerly disagreed. It is only within a few weeks that Professor Sayce, writing on the latest archaeological discoveries, said: "In every case where we can test the Bible story by contemporaneous monuments, the authenticity of which is doubted by no one, we find it confirmed and explained, even in the minutest points." Do you not know, as intelligent men and women, that many recent discoveries of the archaeologists prove that the leaves of the Bible, some of them written three thousand years ago, are absolutely in accord with scientific facts which are continually being revealed?

A Professor's Testimony

That the Bible and modern scientific statements are being more and more harmonized by recent investigations and discoveries, is illustrated by an incident which happened some years ago in the city of Philadelphia, while I was preaching there. If you ever have had any dealings with medical students, you know that there is proportionately more infidelity among them, as a class, than among any other body of young men. Most of this infidelity, I believe, is caused by the evil influences of the dissecting room. One day, when a medical professor, while lecturing upon the body, quoted the well known passage in Job, "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth," a titter of derision ran around the class-room. The college professor raised his hand for silence and said, "Tut, tut, tut, gentlemen, there is no need for laughing. I am not a minister, nor the son of a minister, nor am I a professing Christian, but I here and now want to state that the more I study that Bible, the more it appeals to my intelligence as an inspired Book. I am as firmly convinced that the Bible is inspired as was the centurion convinced of the divinity of Christ, when at the foot of the Cross he cried out in awe, 'Truly this man was the Son of God.' This very passage just quoted displays a knowledge which could not have been acquired by the man who wrote it in any other way than by revelation. For centuries, scientists ridiculed Job's simile about the skin of the teeth. But a few years ago, a microscope was invented with such a powerful lens, that, much to the surprise of the scientists, it was found that Job was right. Over the tooth there is a thin skin, the infinitesimal part of an inch in thickness. Nobody was ever able to see this skin with the naked eye; yet Job saw it in inspiration, thousands of years before the microscope was invented." Thus everywhere we find that science and revelation are becoming more and more harmonized.

Everywhere we see that Jesus in the Greek superscription is appealing to the brain or to the intellectual part of man as well as to his feelings, or to the sentiments of his heart.

The superscription on the Cross was written also in Latin. This implies that Christ will one day be the supreme Ruler of the world, as well as the King of the intellect and the Ruler of the heart. Rome means conquest. In that one word of four letters, we have the tramp of the invading legions of a Julius Caesar triumphing over the Gauls, or of the Augustan hosts annexing the kingdom of a Cleopatra to the empire; or we see the gleaming spears of a Scipio driving the mighty Hannibal over the Alps, and hurling him back across the seas; or we hear the huge battering-rams of a Titus crashing in the gates of the Davidic capital. As England to-day, on account of her great navy and numerous mercantile fleets, is called the "Mistress of the Seas," so Rome, on account of her great armies and navies, could claim to be ruler of the seas, as well as the "Mistress of the world." All roads were once supposed to lead to Rome and meet at the foot of Caesar's throne, so all temporal power shall some day render allegiance to the Throne of Grace.

The Throne of Power

This homage of earthly rulers to the heavenly King is not an allegiance which is only to be given to Christ in the dim future. It is becoming more and more universal, year by year. Some people are apt to picture the greatest of conquerors as a Sesostris or an Attila or an Alexander or a Charlemagne, marching at the head of a great host, while the heavens are raining blood, and the highways are paved with corpses. But an earthly conqueror's throne is nearly always short-lived, and is soon toppled over. Napoleon blazed and burnt himself out in less than twenty years. As soon as the conqueror of the Crusaders was dead, a staff officer, at the command of his departed chief, rode through the camp, waving a white shroud upon the end of a long spear as he cried: "Behold, this is all that is left of the great Saladin! Behold, this is all that is left of the great Saladin!" Attila's kingdom was soon scattered and divided when the Northern ruler had died as the result of a debauch. But though the kingdoms of earthly rulers may be soon swept away, there is a spiritual conqueror, who, for the last two millenniums, has been continually increasing the size of his temporal, as well as spiritual domains. He is now striding across the five continents, and is planting his foot upon the islands of the seas. The people are flocking to his standard by thousands and hundreds of thousands. What is his battle shout? Why, it is the songs of Zion, being sung in all the little meeting houses all over the land. Where is his blood of carnage? It is the symbol of the blood of Christ being lifted to the lips at the Holy Communion. My Lord and my Christ as the conqueror whose name God hath exalted "above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things under the earth," can we not see thee? Can we not touch thee? Can we not confess thee King of kings and Lord of lords?

One night, some years ago, after a day spent among the ruined palaces of Rome, I had two visions, which brought before my imagination, in vivid contrast, the beginning and the consummation of Christ's kingdom. In one I saw the helplessness of the few Christians in that great city during the period following the Crucifixion; in the other I saw in imagination the time of the Millennium, when all peoples shall acclaim Christ Lord of all.

Two Visions

Scene the first: I was standing in a dark Roman dungeon, excavated under another dungeon. It is called Paul's dungeon. There is a little hole in the roof, about two feet square. Through this little aperture the prisoners used to be lowered by ropes. Riveted into the stone wall was an iron ring, to which the helpless victim could be chained. The walls of that dungeon, even on that hot summer day, were damp and cold. As I stood there, I wanted to place myself as nearly as possible in Paul's position. I bade my guide leave me and take away the light. I wanted to be alone. As the guide left, the loneliness became appalling. Even the echoes of the departing footsteps seemed to make those prison walls the more awfully and hopelessly gruesome. As the light disappeared, the darkness rushed in and seemed to press my eyeballs like living coals of fire into my throbbing brain. Then, in imagination, I thought I could see crouching, by the iron ring riveted into the wall, a little, old Jew. His shrivelled limbs were drawn up by rheumatism, the result of his prison confinements. His weak eyes were now straining themselves to catch a glimpse of the executioner, who came nearer and nearer to the aperture above, as my guide with the lantern approached the hole. Then, in imagination, as my guide spoke, I seemed to hear the executioner call out in a harsh, cruel voice, "Paul, Paul, come up! Caesar says 'thou art to die.' Come up! come up!" Then the little old Jew answered, in a weak, though firm voice: "And now I am ready to be offered." The vision was one of the conquest of wrong over right; the vision was that of one of Satan's hirelings triumphing over God's messengers.

Scene the Second: It is midnight. I am standing upon the top of the great Coliseum. Before me are crowded together one hundred thousand men and women, a great mass of humanity, rising tier above tier, and height above height. Yonder, sits the emperor, surrounded by his chief military officers and by the members of the famous Senate. There is the place reserved for the vestal virgins. Here are the rooms of the peasants and the middle classes. All the sight-seers are flushed and excited. The roses in the young girls' cheeks blush even to a deeper red than the drunken flush on the faces of their intoxicated lords. As the entertainment goes on, the bodies of the slain begin to accumulate. Attendants now rush in and drag the bleeding corpses out of the arena. Then the blood-soaked sand is sprinkled with precious powders to allay the odor. Now an awning is drawn over the assembly to protect the nobility from the fiery rays of the Eastern sun. Now the air is redolent with aromatic perfumes. This is a national holiday. Caesar is celebrating the victories of the Roman armies. Now the arena is flooded with water. The ships float in. There is a naval battle. Now the gladiators cut and slash and wrestle and die.

After awhile, even this sport becomes tame. For what are they waiting? They are saving the best until the last. They are now going to let loose the wild beasts upon the Christians. The twilight is coming on. Some of the Christians are bound and fastened to poles, and covered with pitch, and set afire, to make human torches with which to light the dusk. While these flaming torches leap and splutter and play, in the centre of the arena are huddled together scores of men and women who are about to die. While the merciless multitudes look on, the doomed Christians all kneel, except one old patriarch with long, white beard, who stands in their midst to lead in prayer. Now the iron gates are swung back. With one mighty leap, a huge lion lands upon the sands. At first, the flaming torches blind his eyes, and compel him to blink. Then he looks around upon the two hundred thousand human eyes watching him. Then the starving brute suddenly sees the trembling Christians in the centre of the arena. He squats. His claws begin to work convulsively. He crawls nearer and nearer to his prey. He makes one leap. There's a woman's scream. Then with savage ferocity the African monster drags off the body, and begins to crunch the bones.

Again, the sport grows tame. The people are beginning to disperse. The human torches are going out. Darkness is blotting out everything. With folded arms, I turn to go down the steps, saying to myself as I go, "Is it not awful that all these Christians should have been slain for nothing; that all this blood should have been uselessly spilt?" But as I soliloquised thus, a young girl touches my arm. I turn and look at her. She has a sweet face. She says, "You do not know me." "No," I answer, "I have never seen you before." "Well," she says, "I know you. I saw you when you read my epitaph this morning in the catacombs. My father and mother were eaten in this massacre. But they are not dead. Come, let me show you something." The Coliseum at this time is deserted. But as the young girl speaks, suddenly a strange light appears. The walls of the Coliseum begin to enlarge. They grow so high that they lift themselves above the clouds. They grow so wide that they are larger than two hemispheres. Then this huge Coliseum begins to fill up. Angels and archangels and all the redeemed of heaven fill the galleries. Men and women of all nationalities—white and black, and yellow and brown—crowd into the seats which fill the arena. The Esquimaux of the Arctic are there. The black men of the tropics are there. All peoples are there. Then a musical leader takes his place in the centre of the arena, and lifts his baton. Suddenly all these voices swell into one great chorus, as they sing:

Must Jesus bear the Cross alone
And all the world go free;
No, there's a Cross for every one
And there's a Cross for me.

While that great multitude is singing, I turn to my companion and say, "Who are these and whence came they?" "These," she answers, "are the hosts of heaven. Those in the arena are the members of the living human race which are bending the knee to the name of Jesus Christ. That chorus is the echo of Paul's valedictory in the dungeon. This scene was depicted in the superscription which was written over the Cross, and which, in the Latin language, told the Jews that Jesus was to be the temporal as well as the spiritual king." Oh, my brother and sister, as Christ is some day to rule personally over the two hemispheres, shall not you and I, by consecrated lives, try to hasten this glorious millennial day? Shall not our voices be lifted in praise, so that they shall some day find their full diapason in the song of Moses and the Lamb?

But the Hebrew superscription ought to be the most important to us all. It ought to be the most important because the Hebrew language has always been the symbol of God's protecting and pardoning love. The Hebrews were God's favored people. So, when we read the superscription of the Cross in the Hebrew tongue, God seems to say to us as individuals, "I have sent my only begotten Son into the world, that by his blood you may be pardoned of your sins and become part of my new Kingdom." We might believe that Christ is the son of God. We might even believe that someday he shall rule from sea to sea. But that belief will not make him our individual King and Saviour, unless we can read our atonement in his death and his resurrection, which was by symbol written in the Hebrew inscription nailed upon the top of the Cross. Can you not and will you not, by the Hebrew message, believe and accept the statement that Jesus Christ died to save you as individuals? He died to save you, oh man, oh woman, just as though you were the only sinner in all the universe.

By the Hebrew superscription nailed to the Cross, I proclaim a universal pardon and salvation for all sinners. Jesus Christ once said, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness even so must the Son of Man be lifted up." So, to-day, I lift high the Hebrew superscription of the Cross. I cry out, in the words of Revelation: "The Spirit and the Bride say come; And let him that heareth say come, And let him that is athirst come; And whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of Life freely." Sinner, to-day, through the atonement as proclaimed in the Hebrew superscription, will you come and worship the Christ of the intellect; the Christ of coming universal domain, and also the Christ who died that we might all have a part in his future Rulership?

Would that we might one and all be able to interpret the three superscriptions over the Cross, in the way that the dying Christians tried to interpret them. The watcher by the bedside heard her mother whisper, "Bring! Bring!" The daughter said to the dying woman, "Mother, what shall I bring?" "Oh," answered the dying woman, "Bring! Bring!" Then the daughter again asked, "But, mother, what shall I bring?" "Why," cried the dying woman, "bring forth the Royal Diadem and crown him Lord of all." May we one and all, by the blood of Jesus Christ, which was shed for sin, crown Christ King of the heart, King of the head, and King of the two hemispheres. May we crown him a King of Heaven and of earth, even as the superscription over the Cross declared, in three different languages, that Christ was the King of the Jews.

BIBLE TEACHING BY CRAYON PICTURES A NOVEL AND ATTRACTIVE METHOD OF PREACHING THE GOSPEL

A CRAYON DRAWING MADE IN THE OPEN AIR

A UNIQUE and popular method of teaching evangelical doctrines to street audiences has been practised with marked success, for several years, by Rev. Edwin Loucks, at the Bethel Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. The church building is at the corner of Rockaway avenue and Somers street. The Ocean Hill Mission, an undenominational enterprise under the direction of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society, uses the chapel of the building every evening when it is not needed by the church. There is the closest harmony and co-operation between the church and mission. Three meetings are generally held here every week-day evening. The outside meeting begins at 7:45 P.M. A platform, built at the corner entrance of the church, accommodates an organ, several singers, the speakers, and an easel, supporting a picture frame with a sheet of strawboard, 34

x44 inches. The Gospel singers open the meeting by singing several popular hymns, and an audience quickly gathers. Then Mr. Loucks comes from the church, with a trayful of lecturers' crayons of all colors and various shades. Announcing the subject he is about to illustrate (for example, Ignorance, as depicted in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress), he asks for the singing of an appropriate hymn while he is drawing the picture upon the strawboard.

With a rapid swinging motion of the arm, the pastor covers the strawboard sheet with sky and background. Then, with great boldness of execution—using first one color and then another—he fills in the scenery and other features of the picture. He uses white less than the colors, and rarely uses any crayon as long as a minute. Working thus with great energy, his picture is generally finished in less than four minutes. The finishing touch is given by sticking on the board, with a pin, the painted figures, or "paper dolls," representing the individuals of the sketch.

These figures are sometimes painted in oil by Mr. Loucks, in advance of the lesson. Usually, however, he cuts them from the colored lithographs published to illustrate Sunday School lessons.

Having completed, in this expeditious manner, a picture which shows well half a block away, and having gathered an audience of several hundred people, which grows minute by minute, he takes about seven minutes to make a very forcible and direct exposition of the truth illustrated. Then Mr. Bradford Williams, the evangelist of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society, being invited to the platform, gives an earnest Gospel message, concluding with an invitation to his auditors to enter the church and see Mr. Loucks continue his picture-teaching. A more elaborate service of the same character, illustrated by three or four pictures drawn on the spot, is then held in the main auditorium, which is well designed for a popular audience. When this service is concluded, an inquiry meeting is held, in which many souls have been brought to consecrate their lives to their Lord and Master.

The church is located in a district which is built up with the better class of tenement houses, and thousands of their residents are reached by these meetings every week.

Mr. Loucks does not confine himself to crayon work; he also paints religious subjects in oil, and the walls of his church and chapel are nearly covered with allegorical work.

While it would be well nigh impossible to duplicate the talents and conditions of work which are found here, yet this simple statement of what is being done to draw the multitudes, may suggest a similar undertaking to other Christian teachers with artistic talent.

MR. LOUCKS MAKES A THREE-MINUTE DRAWING OF THE ANGEL

THE TRANSFORMATION OF TATE

By E. E. BAYLISS

A CERTAIN boy, when nine years old, heard a remarkable sermon on the devil, which brought him under such pungent conviction that he besought his mother to allow him to unite with the church. His mother told him that he was too young to become a Christian. In view of his mother's opposition, he felt as though his heart would break. Upon reaching home he wan-

"SHE FOUND HIM SEATED UPON A LOG"

dered out into the woods and sat down upon a log, enduring the most poignant grief. In the meantime his mother had prepared dinner, and called, and called in vain, for her boy. Going in search of him she found him out in the timber, seated upon a log; and perceiving the agony depicted upon his face, she exclaimed, "Why, my boy, what's the matter with you? Are you sick?"

"No, mother," he answered, "I'm not sick, but I want to be a true Christian and join the church."

"Oh, come along," she said kindly, "I have got a nice chicken dinner for you. Wait until you become a man; that will be time enough to think of joining the church." After dinner the boy sought his aged grandmother, who, he thought, would most assuredly join with him in persuading his mother to allow him to go forward at the evening service. To his utter discomfiture the grandmother replied, "Why, Charley, you are a good boy; you never told a lie in your life; you don't need to join the church." This boy was Charles S. Tate, afterwards founder and manager of St. Paul's Industrial Mission in Chicago. Nine days from that Sunday he told his first wilful lie; and only eleven months had transpired when he broke into a neighbor's house and stole a shotgun.

"HUNGRY, WEARY AND DESPERATE"

In the spring of 1882 he left his mother's fireside and went into the far West, where his life became wild and reckless. In a camp in Montana he learned to play his first game of cards, first playing for pastime, then for matches and finally for money. He became so infatuated with gambling that he lost all of his hard-earned wages, and was brought to the point where he had to decide whether he should quit gambling or quit work. The devil helped him in his decision to give up his work, and in the fall of 1887 he became a professional gambler. As gambling and drunkenness are twin relatives, and often inseparable, it was not long before he had drifted into the saloon business. His descent was rapid, for he next became a keeper of a low dive, and associated with the vilest of mankind, swearing, cursing, dissipating. In order to drown the voice of his conscience he became an infidel, and adopted the infidel's golden rule, "You do others before they do you."

On January 8, 1890, his old mother died. When he received the intelligence of his mother's decease, it almost broke his heart; yet he continued his nefarious business. Shortly after, he became so disgusted with his miserable career that he fairly longed for its abrupt termination. Of this period he says: "I know that there is no rest, no peace in the ways of sin. I roamed from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the frozen North to the Sunny South in search of the coveted spring of happiness and contentment; but I sought in vain until I committed my way unto the Lord and trusted in him, when he made my life glorious."

He was not all the time in the saloon and gambling business. He ran restaurants, stores, was on the road as a traveling salesman, and studied law, until he was ready to be admitted to the bar; but he never took the preliminary examination.

On the 4th of December, 1898, he went to the city of Spokane (Washington), having previously lived there. He became despondent, and started to gamble again. When he began playing he had fully five hundred dollars in his pocket, and lost every cent of it. He went to the pawnshop and put up his watch and best clothes, hoping with the money thus obtained to recoup; but he was unsuccessful. Saturday night, December 10th, about 10 o'clock, he got up from the gambling table, dead broke and thoroughly disheartened. He had "gone broke" scores of times before and had lost thousands of dollars in a single night; but this time it seemed as though "my heart and will gave completely out. Oh, how I hated myself. Life had at last become unbearable. I walked the streets all that cold and stormy night, and the next morning, which was Sunday, December 11, 1898, I resolved to go to the Post Street bridge, just above the falls, there blow out my brains and fall, a lifeless corpse, into the river. I see myself now as I started to go upon the bridge; hungry, weary, sad, and desperate, with revolver clutched in my hand, fully resolved to take my life. I decided first to go to the Hotel Pedicord and write a letter to my brother, informing him of my end."

"After depositing the letter in the mailbox, I resumed my journey toward the Post Street bridge, fully resolved to end my mortal career. Suddenly the church bell pealed forth. Oh, how sweet it sounded. I halted to listen. My thoughts reverted to my childhood's happy days. I fancied that I was again a child, and it was the Sabbath morning, and I was at home with mother. At the thought the tears commenced to flow down my cheeks. I walked up to the door and peeped in, and saw that there were a few unoccupied seats in the rear. Then I gathered up courage, and entered and took a seat. The pastor, the Rev. Wesley K. Beans, D.D., was preaching. His theme was, 'The sins of the tongue.' It was the most eloquent and convincing sermon that I ever heard. I remember well when he said, 'Man can tame the beasts, but it takes Almighty God to tame man.' When the congregation arose to sing the concluding hymn I felt so sad and despondent it seemed as if my heart would burst. I fancied I could hear the voice of my dear mother, whispering softly into my ear, 'Come, my boy, trust in God and he will give you rest,' and, as if moved by his mighty enabling, I arose, and without any invitation from the pastor, walked up to the altar, fell upon my knees and told God my troubles. I surrendered my revolver to the pastor, for I had no further use for it. Desiring to be alone with my Saviour, I went to the Pacific Hotel, procured a room, and there prayed to and praised the Lord until I fell asleep. Oh, what a blessed, refreshing sleep I enjoyed that night. I arose the next morning at nine o'clock and asked God to protect and guide me. I went downstairs, borrowed fifty cents from my friend Jimmy Cairns, and procured a hearty breakfast, which I thoroughly enjoyed, as I had not tasted food for thirty-nine hours. After breakfast I called on the Rev. W. K. Beans, and, in company with him, went to the post office and reclaimed the letter which I had mailed to my brother, and then I felt happy and grateful to my God and Saviour."

Shortly after Brother Tate's conversion, the Spokane Y. M. C. A. work was inaugurated; he had taken an active part in all the preliminaries, and when it was organized was its first member; the first eleven were officers and directors, and he was No. 12, the first on the list of private members.

He attended the Moody Institute at Chicago. In the spring of 1900 he was eager to do evangelistic work, feeling impressed that God wanted him to go into the lumber camps of Wisconsin and upper Michigan. He tried hard to get some person, like-minded, to accompany him in the work. The only individual whose co-operation he could secure was a blessedly saved and entirely consecrated Japanese, K. Sa Kai. This young man had the simplest and most child-like faith imaginable. He was attending the singing classes in the institute, and tried hard to master the English language, so that he could sing and tell forth the Gospel. One day the musical director said to him, "It is no further use for you to try to sing in English. Your palate is so peculiarly constructed that it is a vocal impossibility." Our Japanese brother responded, "Did not God make my vocal cords as they are?" "Yes, of course he did." "Well, if God wants me to sing his glad tidings in English, can't he change the formation of my palate?" The brother held on to God with that definite end in view and practiced faithfully, while he scrubbed the floors for his tuition. Now he has charge of the singing and presides at the organ in the St. Paul's Industrial Mission. It is asserted that K. Sa Kai is the only Japanese living who can sing in English.

They started forth to sell the Colportage Library, as a means of defraying their expenses, and together went into the work, carrying a portable Bilhorn organ with them.

Brother Tate, with his mascot—the Japanese—inaugurated the St. Paul's Industrial Mission at 815 West Division Street, Chicago, Ill., on December 11, 1901. This work is not patterned after any other evangelistic effort. There are no collections ever taken in the meetings; no person is ever asked to contribute a cent toward defraying the expenses. Naturally one would ask, how then is the work supported? On this wise: Brother Tate is one of the most successful salesmen on the road. When, in answer to importunate pleading, God revealed to him the pattern of the work which he would own and bless, the man was no disobedient to the heavenly vision, but with alacrity and delight, he placed himself immediately in the channel of God's will. "The Golden Rule Cutlery Works" were established, for the manufacture and sale, by accredited agents, of the best grade of cutlery, razors, knives, scissors, shears, etc., that the market affords. The knives have transparent handles, and underneath are printed portraits, emblems, mottoes, or Scripture passages, as selected by the customer. Mr. Tate was selling his goods in a certain town and was meeting with good success, when, one noon hour, he approached a group of young men, soliciting their orders. One of them, the toughest of the company, said that he would give an order for a knife provided that he could have a certain picture put into the handle. Mr. Tate replied that he was not in that kind of business. The young fellow began jeering and ridiculing and asserted that Mr. Tate had "rats in his wool" and that he was a religious crank. He finally gave his order for a knife. Several of those present informed Mr. Tate that he need make no provision to fill the order, for the fellow would not pay anyhow. Mr. Tate learned that a certain gentleman in the town owed the fellow $3.60; hence, he went to the man and stated the circumstances under which that if he would prosper me as I thought I would be prospered, I would myself support my missionary in a foreign field, and never for a moment did I waver in that vow until the Lord turned me over into being a foreign missionary. And when I had, with my mother's and my father's blessing, consecrated myself, and was leaving for the foreign field, I then learned for the first time, that my mother, as her first act after the birth of her eldest son, had placed me before the Lord and vowed that I should, so far as her consecration and her influence should go, be a foreign missionary."

"WELL, SIR, HERE'S YOUR KNIFE"

The young man received his education at the Western Reserve College, Ohio, graduating in 1856. He then went to New Brunswick Theological Seminary and subsequently studied at the Medical College in New York, from which he received his diploma in 1859. But it was not as a physician that he was to attain the eminence which would assuredly have come to him in any path of life. His mother's prayers had been heard, the vow with which she had consecrated her boy had been accepted, and in due time the call to labor at the front came to him. He offered himself to the Board of Missions of the Reformed Dutch Church, and was appointed to its mission at Palamanair, in the Madras Presidency of India.

The field was a difficult one, as it still is, though American benevolent factions to the suffering people in their time of famine, have disarmed much of the opposition that the missionary met with in those early years. Dr. Chamberlain was quick to perceive how his medical knowledge might help him to win his way as a preacher among the people. He opened a small hospital and dispensary in connection with the mission, and soon afterwards opened others at Madanapalli. Patients flocked to him, but he made it clear to them that it was as a missionary that he had come and that his medical service was but subsidiary to his Gospel work. Each ticket admitting a patient to consultation had, printed on the back of it, a concise statement of Christian doctrine, and when the patients had been examined and their prescriptions written, a short service of reading and prayer was held, while Dr. Chamberlain's assistant made up the prescriptions. That these services were appreciated was evident. On one day three Brahman clerks were among the patients. Knowing that they were in an office where unpunctuality was punished, Dr. Chamberlain ordered their prescriptions hurried forward, and told them that while it was the rule for patients to wait for the service, he would, under the circumstances, allow them to have their medicine and go to their office. They replied, "No, we prefer to wait for the prayer. We are not of your religion, but the God who sent you to heal us will hear your prayers, and we will wait while you pray to him."

Dr. Chamberlain has gone on preaching and healing year after year, with brief intervals of rest, for forty-three years, and is now, as he says, starting to round out his half-century of service. In 1874, and again in 1884, impaired health necessitated a voyage home, but he was restless and uncomfortable until he could return to his work, in which God has signally blessed him. Very different in character has been the work of Dr. John G. Paton. It is not the learned Hindoo, with his idolatrous beliefs and his subtle reasoning, that he has had to contend, but with painted savages, brutal, debased cannibals, who had not even a written language until the missionaries reduced their barbarous speech to writing. He was engaged in City Mission work in Glasgow, when an appeal was made for a missionary to carry the good tidings of the Gospel to the islands of the Southern Pacific. It was known to be a work of personal danger, for already one of the most successful missionaries who ever preached to the heathen, the zealous and devoted John Williams, had been brutally murdered there, and stories of ghastly orgies had been brought by traders who had visited the islands. John G. Paton was accustomed to hardship, having been reared on a poor Scottish farm, with ten brothers and sisters to be provided for. He had gained a college education by hard work and self denial; he had a robust constitution and undaunted courage. But he had little confidence in his own powers. He wanted to see if worst savages, but are now earnest, zealous teachers, to be convinced that there is no nature so savage that God's power cannot change it."

In the course of the same address, Dr. Paton made an eloquent plea to civilized nations to refrain from sending intoxicating liquor to the people of the New Hebrides. He said that one missionary, whose life had been three times attempted, was so respected by the people that not one of them when sober would molest him, and many would go to his defense and risk their lives to protect him; but under the influence of liquor, the old savage brutality reasserted itself and his life was in constant peril. All the good that was being done was menaced by the cargoes of intoxicants which were brought to the islands, and sold to the natives by merchants trading under the flags of Christian nations.

Dr. Paton bears honorable testimony to the devotion of the missionaries who have labored with him during the forty-four years of his service. Never did men encounter dangers with greater intrepidity, or undergo trial and hardship with more cheerfulness. The success has been marvelous. Erromanga, where John Williams was murdered, is now a Christian island, the whole population being under Christian influence, the churches well filled and the children in Christian schools. Island after island has been won for Christ, and a college for native teachers is now conducted, in which men and women, whose parents were cannibals, are being prepared for Christian service. Several islands still remain in the grasp of heathenism; but even of these there is hope. It is a wonderful record of Gospel triumphs that have been won within the lifetime of one man.

In reply to the assertion frequently made, that the inhabitants of the New Hebrides were so degraded, that they had no conception of a God, and did not even worship idols. Dr. Paton says that, on the contrary, he found the islands full of idols. The people worshiped trees and stones, and any natural prodigy. They also had a deep veneration for their ancestors. In their burial places the trees were quaintly carved into grotesque likenesses of the deceased, and to these were paid religious honors. A curious custom was observed in these cemeteries. The savages wear no clothes, save that the women had a species of skirt made of long grass. But when a death occurred, they had the desire, like civilized people, to show a sense of their loss. Wearing no clothes, they could make no change of attire, but they made a species of whitewash with which they covered their heads and shoulders, thus making a most grotesque appearance. Photographs of both customs are reproduced on this page.

A significant fact in connection with the work in the New Hebrides, is the part played by the children. Early in his work there a child, who had been left an orphan, was brought to him to help his wife in her work. Mrs. Paton dressed her, and her appearance so impressed the other children, that they pleaded to be at the mission station too. Thus a number of children were gathered there, their confidence was won, and they were taught the truth. They loved the missionary and his wife, and when there were plots against his life, they revealed them. Dr. Paton is convinced, that had it not been for the faithful affection of those children, he would never have escaped the murderous schemes of the natives in those early days of trial.

HEATHEN NATIVES OF AMERIM, WITH HEADS WHITEN FOR MOURNING

some man of greater learning and ability offered himself; but none came, and so Paton stood forth and declared himself ready to go. He was accepted by the Presbyterian Church, and in April, 1858, he sailed for the new Hebrides.

"When we went there," Dr. Paton said in his speech in New York, "we found a people without civilization, without clothing, so debased that one almost despaired of their ever being able to receive the Gospel. We have now on that group of thirty islands three thousand converts. These people have family worship in their homes; they have built two large churches, which are filled to overflowing, and they have organized missionary societies to carry the Gospel to other islands. Wherever we have been able to place teachers the good effects are seen. We have the Bible translated and printed in twenty-two dialects that were unknown to the world when I entered the field. But the sacrifices were terrible. Five missionaries were murdered on the islands during the progress of the work. At one time I was the only missionary left. More than once a rifle has been pointed at me and the savage has had his finger on the trigger. Seizing the barrel I have turned it aside, and have prayed to God for protection. In every case my prayer was heard, though my life for a few moments hung by a hair. There are thousands of cannibals on those islands yet, but the work of God is going forward and victory is sure. We have only to look at our three hundred native helpers, many of whom were among the

A Thanksgiving Reminder

YEARS ago, in wandering through the wilderness of Russian literature, we came upon a story that was like a green, refreshing oasis. It told of a hard-working peasant cobbler, very poor, but good-hearted, and with the love of his fellow-men warming his breast, under his coarse, woolen coat. He believed that Christ would some day visit his humble cabin, and he was ever waiting and watching for the Master. It was night; a beggar rapped at the door, pleading for entrance and warmth. The cobbler opened to him, and set him in his own seat by the embers of the fire—the warmest nook in the hut. Another rap—a shivering, thinly clad woman, weak with cold and hunger, stood at the door. She accepted in silence the bread and the little portion of hot soup the peasant tendered, and went away comforted. Still another tap—this time it was a lad, faint with cold, and with feet blue and pinched under their wretched covering of rags. The peasant gave him food, warmed him, wrapped his own coat about the shivering youth, and covered his naked feet, before he would let him go. Then, the door being again shut and the street deserted, the cobbler fell asleep.

In his slumber there came to him a vision of Christ, who told him that it was He who had tested the cobbler's heart, and had found it full of deep and true love and sympathy for those in suffering. Then the peasant knew that He whom he served had been in his hut that night. And the knowledge of it gladdened his life, and made his poor dwelling like the gate of heaven.

Knocking at the door of your heart, at this season, are the poor, the outcast, the hungry, the suffering. It is your Thanksgiving; make it, as far as lies in your power, their Thanksgiving, too. Christ, who came to the poor Russian peasant, comes to us also; let us not deny Him, when He tests our love, and the genuineness of our generous professions. Let us give with open and liberal hand to those who are in need, that they may share with ourselves the joy of Thanksgiving for the blessings which the Father sends to His children.

This opportunity may lie at your own door. In any case, it lies not very far away. If you have been blessed with enough and to spare this year, then remember those who are facing penury and hunger, and to whom Thanksgiving will be a day of sad memories, unless you transform it to one of gladness and gratitude. Remember, too, the Bowery Mission, which feeds thousands of the homeless and worthy poor every Thanksgiving. You can have a share in this gracious work, by sending in a gift this week, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the Mission's Thanksgiving dinner. By doing this, you will be performing a Christ-like duty to some needy one, and, like the Russian peasant, you will hear in your own heart the whisper of the Master's words, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me."

"The Hall of Fame"

To read this book is to be conducted into the presence of "those whose deeds and thoughts are the inheritance, education, inspiration and aspiration of endless generations." To study the great is to take on their qualities. Fathers, mothers and teachers, in putting such a volume in the hands of youths and maidens, are bringing them under high influences. There is not a boy or girl but will be of finer and stronger moral fibre for reading this book, nor is there one but will be interested in it. The quality of adaptation to all ages imparts a peculiar value to this volume as a household treasure. While the sketches are thoroughly instructive, they are not dry; even little ones around the hearth will be glad to listen to the pretty stories here and there of the child-life of great men, while the pulses of the man and woman in life's meridian and of the gray-haired will be stirred to fresh hope and new endeavor by this recital of lofty deeds. No richer Christmas gift could be placed in any hands.

Good News From India

A FEW weeks ago, our missionaries in India were greatly depressed over the gloomy crop prospects. Continued drought and the impending failure of the grain crop foreshadowed another famine. Now, however, the outlook is favorable for a good harvest. Rev. E. S. Hume writes from Bombay, under date Sept. 25: "All the prospects are now favorable. For this we are most grateful. Until the harvest is gathered, however, there will be widespread distress; for the people, who are always poor, have lost one crop this year, and still must wait months for the next. The Lord preserve them! Many thanks for your unfailing sympathy and help."

This cheering news will be welcomed by all who have been specially interested in the welfare of India, and who have aided in the relief work which has been the means, under providence, of saving countless multitudes from starvation during the last two famines in that much afflicted land.

The Best Holiday Gift

"The best Christmas gift is your Red Letter Bible, or your Red Letter Testament," is the testimonial of Mrs. William King, a noted church-worker in the South and teacher of a Sunday School class of one hundred and twenty-five members. "When I am doubtful as to what any friend at all religiously inclined would like for a present, I send that. I have found, too, that lawyers, authors and business men generally welcome it. Of course, every preacher and Sunday School worker is glad to get one. Suppose, too, there is some dear one whom you want to draw to Christ. What better reminder of him than these precious volumes in which his words of love and wisdom flash out in scarlet from the text? My Red Letter Bible and Testament are invaluable."

The Lesson of Life

IF, standing upon the vantage ground of the year of grace 2002 A.D., one could learn what the then inhabitant of this continent thought of our present civilization, the knowledge would produce in us some strange emotions. We have a notion that, looking back at us across the century, he would regard us pretty much in the same light in which we now view our progenitors of revolutionary days. There would be a difference in detail, of course, for the kaleidoscope of time has infinite variety; but parallels, even under the changed conditions, would not be hard to seek. He would point out our mad national race for mere wealth at any sacrifice. He would note the division of the people into two great camps—the workers and the plutocrats. He would observe with interest, and possibly with some little commiseration, the interminable struggle of creeds and sectarians, the jealousies and the bigoted persecutions—not to the death, as in the old Salem days, but equally bitter, nevertheless—in the name of religion. Nor would he fail to observe such moving spectacles as those of the Doukhorbor fanatics marching across the neighboring territory of Canada, barefoot and starving, as though they were on some painful mediæval pilgrimage under vows, instead of in an enlightened Christian land. He would look back with pity upon the scenes of wretchedness and suffering among the multitudinous poor in our great cities, and would exclaim in horrified wonder at our tramp problem—that vast army of social and industrial castaways, who live, like the locusts of Egypt, off the land. He would marvel at our great man-killing machines, at our soul-and-body killing plague of alcohol, at our innumerable prisons, many of them like great temples; at our taxation, nearly seventy-five per cent. of which is due to prevalent crime, while, instead of reforming criminals, we brutalize and harden them. He would shudder at our abuse of the brute creation, and smile at our lingering superstitions.

But however such an observer might be impressed by such a retrospect, he could find much to approve. He would be moved by the intense earnestness of the struggle for the moral uplift of the masses, and with the splendid growth of that broad Christian humanitarianism which finds so many different ways of expression. Amid all the trial and turmoil, man's face has been resolutely set toward the goal of a purer life, and his heart has glowed more and more fervidly with love for his fellow-man. He has been growing in grace—slowly, yet perceptibly. The record of acts of kindness, the hospitals, the missions, the charities, the philanthropies, the ten thousand "golden deeds" that distinguish this age from all others, show it. Step by step, he has been learning the great lesson of his mission here. Only by retrospect can we measure the progress of the generations. When we reach the end of the road, though a glance backward may seem to reveal to us more reverses than triumphs, more discouragements than plaudits, may we be consoled with the assurance that the Great Teacher, knowing of all our struggle, is satisfied even with our small achievement, since we have kept our hearts and our faces towards the light.

Feeling, But Not Doing

HERE is a strange old Chinese legend. The three great religious teachers of the Celestial Empire, looking down after death from their exalted seats in the other world, beheld with profound sorrow the degeneracy of their people; and mourning that their life work seemed so entire a failure, they returned to the earth in order to find some one, faithful and able, whom they could send forth as a reformer. They came in their wanderings to an old man sitting as guardian of a fountain. He talked to them so wisely and so earnestly of the great concerns which they had most at heart, that they came to the conclusion that he was precisely the man for the work they wished done. But when they proposed the mission to him he smiled, and calmly replied:

"It is the upper part of me only that is flesh and blood; the lower part is of stone. I can talk about virtue and good works, and approve them all, but I cannot rise from my seat to do any righteous or useful act."

Is not this legend of the old guardian of the Chinese fountain significant? Does it not accurately tell the state in which many a Christian is found—sitting close by the fountain of life-giving truth, as if a guardian and dispenser of its blessings, yet never rising to take one brave step for its defence, or to make one earnest endeavor to bring its precious waters to the fevered lips of a sick and dying world; knowing the way of service, dreaming sometimes of walking in that way, feeling sometimes an impulse to rise up and be doing for Christ and for men, yet still sitting there with a sort of petrified inability of will towards translating the good impulses and noble dreamings into substantial and veritable deeds.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST ROBERT L. LAYFIELD, of Kansas City, has just closed successful meetings at Benton City, Mo. Among the converts at these gatherings was a prominent physician of the town.

—THE CHURCHES of Auburn, Ind., lately invited Dr. F. E. Smiley to direct their revival meetings, with excellent spiritual results. Messrs. Smiley and McKinsey are now at Kearney, Neb.

—RAYNER, VA., has recently experienced a revival, Rev. Mr. Broadus, of the Central Hill Church, conducting the services. During the series of meetings over forty persons confessed Christ.

—A LETTER FROM the General Superintendent of West Indian Missions, Barbados, W. I., states that smallpox is devastating that island. There are over one thousand cases and the mortality is high.

—MEMBERS OF THE LIGHTHOUSE LEAGUE, particularly if they are doing active League work, will take pleasure in wearing one of the specially designed badges. Those members wishing badges, which are made of metal and enamel, may secure them at the actual cost price of 50 cents apiece and a two cent stamp. Address Orrin B. Booth, General Secretary, 92 Bible House, New York City.

—LAST SUMMER, Okayama, Japan, was scourged by cholera. In the city alone there were 972 cases, 702 of them fatal. One result of this visitation is, that a number of orphaned waifs have been thrown on the tender mercies of the world. They have been cared for by the Okayama Orphanage. Superintendent B. W. Pettie, of the Orphanage, has written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, appealing to its readers in behalf of these orphans, for whose support funds are urgently needed.

"The Speaking Oak"

"It may be," says Rev. Dr. Iglehart, author of this book, "that young men and women will find in these stories some new light on the pathway of life, some nobler ambition, brighter hope or better service. Maybe, men and women immersed in the business or cares of the world may gain some added strength for burdens, courage for conflicts, and patience in perplexities. Possibly, the aged in reading may take new comfort." Could a more blessed tribute be tendered a loved one as a Christmas offering than such a book? Think of what a treasure-trove for the home reading-table this volume of beautiful stories and pictures would make, and possess it for yourself and children, or make some other home glad with it. Family-life will be the sweeter and happier for its elevating influence and delightful entertainment. The speaker and the essayist will find its anecdotes helpful.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Doukhobors on the March

SOME anxiety has been caused in Canada by a strange movement among the Doukhobors, the persecuted Russian sect, eight thousand of whom settled in the North West Territory about three years ago. About sixteen hundred men, women and children left their villages, and on October 27 entered Yorkton. They said they were on a mission to convert the world and that they were looking for Jesus. The Government officials, finding that they were poorly supplied with clothing and provisions, urged them to return to their villages, but they refused. The women and children were sheltered, but the men have gone forward towards Winnipeg. The other Doukhobors, who have remained in their villages, are taking care of the property their brethren have left behind, and have joined with the Canadian authorities in urging them to return, but hitherto without success. Some premonition of the trouble came several weeks before, when the report was published that many of the Doukhobors had extended their vegetarian doctrines under the preaching of a fanatical visitor. They reached the conclusion that it was not only wrong to eat animal food, but it was wrong to use the wool of the sheep for clothing, or the hides of cattle for shoes; and that it was also wrong to compel horses and cattle to work for them. They therefore turned loose the horses, cattle and sheep given them by the Government, and the work of plowing and drawing the wagons was done by their women. No one interfered with them in this, but now their new movement threatens to be dangerous to themselves and the public. People who know their disposition advise that they be let alone, as they would regard coercion, even though in their own interest, as persecution, and would become more obstinate and determined in their strange aberration. They profess to make the Bible the guide of their lives, but they appear to have overlooked the Apostolic warning:

In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits . . . commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving; for every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused (I. Timothy 4: 1-4).

Operated on Himself

A remarkable surgical operation was performed by a man in Brooklyn, N. Y., recently. A veterinary surgeon, who is well known in the city, has been suffering for some months from a painful swelling on the tongue, and lately the glands of his neck have swollen. He attributed the trouble to a large decayed tooth, which had given him considerable pain and which he had finally had extracted. But the swelling was not relieved, and it grew so large that he had difficulty in swallowing. He then consulted a physician, who told him that he had cancer in a pronounced form. He was advised to undergo an operation and went to a hospital to make arrangements. His talk with the surgeons and the prospect of the operation they proposed to perform, distressed him, and he was, besides, strongly averse to being placed under the influence of ether. The suspense, too, was hard to bear.

He knew that unless an operation was performed, the cancer would kill him, but he feared, on the other hand, that his heart was in such a condition that he would die under the operation if ether was administered. Finally, he took the instruments he used in his veterinary work, and, standing before a mirror, cut away with his own hand the cancerous growth from his tongue and dressed the wound without the aid of a doctor. He has since been in good health, and is confident that the whole of the diseased parts were removed. Other surgeons are in some doubt on the subject, but a few weeks will show whether he is right. Few men, even of those who have the skill, would have had the nerve to do such a thing. The man knew his life was at stake and therefore took heroic measures to save it. It is a pity that when men realize that their souls are at stake, they are not similarly prompt and determined in removing out of their lives the evils that imperil them.

A SCENE IN THE BORGHESSE PARK IN ROME.

If thy right hand causeth thee to stumble, cut it off and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not thy whole body go into hell (Matt. 5: 30, R. V.).

Thanksgiving Proclamation

In accordance with our annual custom, the President has issued the proclamation appointing November 27 as Thanksgiving Day. In enumerating the blessings for which we, as a people, should thank God, President Roosevelt says: "Over a century and a quarter has passed since this country took its place among the nations of the earth, and during that time we have had, on the whole, more to be thankful for than has fallen to the lot of any other people. Generation after generation has grown to manhood and passed away. Each has had to bear its peculiar burdens, each to face its special crises, and each has known years of grim trial, when the country was menaced by malice, domestic or foreign has been in the market for some time and the Italian Government desired to purchase it for the nation. The price it was willing to pay, however, was less than the owners were willing to accept. It seemed probable that some private person of wealth would become the purchaser, but the King, who has strongly advocated its acquisition for public use, came to the rescue, and by a large payment from his private purse has made up the difference, and the sale has been concluded for $600,000. As its name implies, the property formerly belonged to the famous Borghese family, of which Pope Paul V. was a member. In every generation for three centuries the head of the house was prominent in public affairs. One of them, who married Napoleon's sister, Pauline, was made Governor-General of Piedmont and Genoa. Latterly, however, the family has become involved in financial difficulties, and finally has been obliged to relinquish its treasured seat. Little did the proud princes who once owned it think that it would pass from the hands of their descendants into those of the ordinary people, whom they despised.

Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue forever and their dwelling-places to all generations; they call their lands after their own names (Ps. 49: 11).

Burning Millions in Fuel

The coal strike has led to a strange spectacle in a Government Department in Washington, D. C. It appears that in spite of the high price of coal, it has cost the Government less by $150 than usual to maintain the fires in the furnaces of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. To make this saving, however, fuel has been cast into the furnaces for which the Government paid several million dollars. Beginning with July, 1901, when the stamp tax on bank checks and telegrams was abolished, and augmented since July of this year by the repeal of other stamp taxes, wagon loads of unused stamps have been sent to the Treasury for redemption. In an ordinary way these would have been destroyed in the furnace provided for the purpose, and the heat would have been wasted, but with the scarcity of fuel it was decided to utilize them. The stokers sandwiched a layer of fifty thousand dollars' worth of Government securities between two thin layers of coal, and at the end of the month it was found that nearly a ton of coal a day had been saved through the use of the high grade fuel. There is no reason why this saving of fuel should not continue. Since the redeemed securities must be destroyed, it is well that the heat generated should be turned to useful account. It is so with some of the qualities in human nature when conversion takes place. The energy which Paul employed in persecuting the church was used in missionary labor.

His grace which was bestowed on me was not in vain; but I labored more than they all (I. Cor. 15: 10).

BRIEF NOTES

A young native lady of India, a personal friend of Pandita Ramabai, being educated at an American college for a medical missionary career in her native land, finds herself unable to proceed with her studies for lack of means. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is personally acquainted with her and her father, and will be pleased to furnish all necessary information concerning the case to those of its readers who may write us on the subject. The young lady belongs to an estimable native family of the highest caste, now Christian, and she is deserving of all the material assistance that may be generously extended to her at the present time. If fifty friends could be found to give a dollar a month each, for a short period, the career of a very bright and promising young medical missionary would be assured.

Renewing subscribers will confer a great favor on the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if, when renewing, they state that their subscription is a RENEWAL, or attach, if convenient, the yellow date tab to their letter.

BIBLE DICTIONARY

"I have found my 'Teachers' Edition of the Bible Dictionary,' which you sent me invaluable," writes a Sunday School teacher. "I am able to interest my class as never before. A number of my boys have brought me rude drawings of pictures I had shown them in the book. I find that when I understand the ancient terms and the physical symbols thoroughly, I can more clearly convey spiritual truths. The information in the dictionary is most conveniently arranged, and a great help to Bible study."

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 23
ISAIAH 28

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—ISAIAH 28: 7:
"THEY ALSO HAVE ERRED THROUGH WINE"

Civic Righteousness Prelude

In accordance with Resolution of Denver International Sunday School Convention

ISAIAH, THE PROPHET

Supt. (or Pastor):—What is civic righteousness?

Asst. Supt. (or School):—It is doing right in matters of government; the citizen doing right in every vote, the State in every law.

Supt.—In what words are Christians required by their Master to perform their duties to Government as well as their duties to God?

Asst. Supt.—“Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and to God the things that are God’s.”

Supt.—What is the practical meaning of that law, and the deeper one on which all law is based, Thou shalt love thy God and thy neighbor?

Asst. Supt.—All these divine laws aim to establish RIGHT RELATIONS—right relations between man and God, and between man and man, the double relation that constitutes religion.

Supt.—And what does government have to do with securing these right relations?

Asst. Supt.—Government so far as it uses force and penalty, aims only to establish right relation between man and man; but the Supreme Court, in 1892, declared, “This is a Christian nation,” and as such it recognizes, but does not enforce, God’s authority as the Supreme Ruler and the authority of Christian morality, by the oath on the Bible, by prayers in Congress, by chaplaincies and Thanksgiving Days, by Bible reading and the Lord’s Prayer in the schools, and by closing courts and public offices on Sunday.

Supt.—Does not the State enforce religion when it compels men to stop work and business on Sunday?

Asst. Supt.—The Supreme Court declared, in 1885, in a unanimous opinion, that Sunday laws are justified on economic and scientific grounds, as a needed protection of workmen and tradesmen in their right to rest. Marriage laws, also of Bible origin, are justified in a similar way, because they are necessary to right relations among men. The law stops Sunday work because labor and rest are a matter between man and man, and a six-day law is needed no less than a ten-hour law to restrain greed and prevent overwork; but no Sunday law enforces Sunday worship, which is a matter between man and God.

Supt.—And what does civic righteousness require of a Christian citizen and a “Christian nation” in the matter of temperance, in view of the fact that intemperance, more than almost anything else, destroys “right relations” between man and man? Do any of the Ten Commandments condemn our drinking usages or our drink traffic?

Asst. Supt.—All of them do, for drinkers break them all. As alcohol is the Decalogue’s worst foe, abstinence is its best friend. But it is a great error to suppose there are only ten commandments. Surely New Testament commandments are no less binding, and one of them, formerly mistranslated, is, “Abstain from every form of evil.”

Supt.—Have preachers and teachers any right to teach temperance?

Asst. Supt.—Surely we ought to teach what our churches have so often approved by resolutions, even if we had not stronger reasons in our Bibles, in whose pages prophets and apostles reasoned with kings of “righteousness, temperance and a judgment to come.” “Righteousness” leads straight to “temperance.”

Supt.—For kings there was a “judgment to come,” but is there any judgment day for governments and for nations?

Asst. Supt.—Their judgment days, the Bible teaches, come in this world, and every great world empire of antiquity has undergone sentence of death for its sins. Not one government since the world began has flourished a thousand years.

Supt.—We are to study two dying nations to-day. To one of them that text was spoken that we have so often cut in two as if intended only for individuals, “Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.”*

The Lesson Story

The time when Isaiah uttered the brave warnings of this lesson was three years before the captivity of the kingdom of Israel, which was made up of the ten tribes that seceded under Jeroboam I. Great prosperity, as usual, had brought forgetfulness of God and those destructive vices ever found with luxury, intemperance, and impurity. As Augustus “found Rome brick and left it marble,” but also found it a republic and left it despotic, so Jeroboam II. found Israel cottages and left it palaces; but he also found it moral and left it corrupt, aye, found it free and left it captive, first to its own vices, and consequently to the Assyrians, whom it could not resist, when its own virtue was undermined and the favor of God was forfeited. As often in history, conquest was possible only because of moral cancer. When Isaiah spoke the Assyrians were already sweeping down, like a “Scourge of God,” upon the upper kingdom.

SEBUSTIYEH. ANCIENT SAMARIA, CAPITAL OF THE NORTHERN KINGDOM OF ISRAEL

Illustration and Application

Woe unto the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim, and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty. Isaiah here calls the whole kingdom of Israel “Ephraim,” after the name of its chief tribe. “Look,” says Isaiah, in substance, “to the ruin which intemperance is bringing to our sister state, and behold the same symptoms of approaching national death here in Judah.” Samaria and Judah were never conquered except when corrupted. The bottles on the inside were the battering rams they had most to fear. Samaria, the capital city of Israel, was built on the summit of a verdant, cone-shaped hill, where the marble palaces, glistening in the sun, seemed from a distance like the crown of silvery olive leaves, with which its revelers were crowned at their feasts.

Overcome with wine.—That has been written of many who started in life as confidently as the bright boys and girls in our Sunday schools. Shall it be written of any to whom this lesson comes with timely warning? It cannot be true of any person whose practice is abstinence. “Overcome with wine” a man becomes a wild beast, and even a beast it makes more beastly. A Chicago despatch of a few weeks ago said: “Maddened and half-intoxicated from alcohol used in distillery ‘slop’ fed to them, a big herd of cattle stampeded in the stockyards. More than a score of the animals met death in the rush. Scenes were enacted that for terror and blood made old stockmen and cowboys turn their backs. One man nearly lost his life. The herd stampeded numbered more than six hundred of the kind that are known as the ‘distillery cattle,’ and are fattened on the refuse from liquor mills.” Drunken horned cattle are not so terrible as drunken men armed with pistols, as they rage about their homes, destroying wife and children.

In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory. In contrast to the reveler’s crown, this verse sets the crown of glory that God gives in creating man in his own image and guiding him with wise counsels. When Henry M. Stanley was in the heart of Africa, a native was dragged before him charged with stealing a gun. Stanley saw that the gun clearly belonged to his party. The poor native, frightened at the mention of Stanley’s name, could scarcely speak, but he found strength to say: “I am a son of God, I would not steal.” This he said again and again. Stanley was interested believing this man to be a missionary convert and innocent of any intentional theft, and so he gave him back the gun and allowed him to go. At the next station, they found the gun waiting them. It had not been stolen, but dropped by its owner and found by the native; but on his release he had gone to the missionary for counsel, at whose prompting he brought back the gun. But what a word he gave those white men: “I am a son of God, I would not steal.” Much more should every one say: “I am a son of God, I will not drink.” “Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy.”

Israel’s captivity was perpetual, as we recall in speaking sadly of the “lost tribes,” while Judah repented and was restored. So the many among those who once enter the captivity of appetite are “lost,” while a few only are restored mostly those who have learned in their despair that

The Lion of Judah can break every chain
And give us the victory again and again.

But these restored captives are the very ones who tell the boys and girls with most intensity that “prevention is better than cure,” that it is easier to prevent than to repent. Why should any one who loves his fellows, or even himself, touch a thing that is not a necessity of life, that may grow to be an inward chain for himself or for some one who is led to drink by his example? No Christian should have any part in keeping up a custom which, on the whole, will do harm rather than good. Merely to please myself I have no right to endanger both myself and others.

New York has recently furnished a fresh illustration of the fact that drink, like death, “loves a shining mark”—and in this case both hit the mark. One morning the papers published the news that a man had been murdered in a saloon, in a quarrel about women. The name was that of one whose father had been Secretary of State. The victim himself had worn many “crowns of pride” in diplomacy and in finance and in society, but in that uncovering of his double life, his crowns all suddenly faded. Far worse than death was the shame he had brought on himself and his family. His bottle had proved a bullet to shoot his loved ones to the heart. Let us put with Isaiah’s “Woe to the crown of pride,” Solomon’s “Who hath woe?” and Habakkuk’s “Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink.” We do that when we directly or indirectly authorize another to do it.

The crown of pride shall be trodden under foot. Here again the reveler’s crown is pictured, not alone as faded, but as trampled under foot. How literally all that is beautiful in life is trampled under foot by drink! The orange blossoms, even of a happy bridal, are soon trampled on by a drunken husband—alas! with increasing frequency in these days by a drunken wife. Love is turned to loathing. The beautiful home becomes a hovel, or is exchanged for one. The beautiful boy becomes a bloated tramp, the beautiful girl a drunkard’s haggard wife. Let us stop this treading of beauty under foot, and instead tread down the evil custom and stamp out the evil traffic.

DISTILLERY CATTLE ON A STAMPEDE

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

Some Uses of Fads

A BUSINESS or professional man is the better for a fad, for something quite without the lines of his usual work, which commands attention and excites interest, and, incidentally, gives real pleasure. One of the best things a camera does for its owner, is the fact that it takes him completely away from the grind of routine, and allies him with the artistic forces of the world. To some extent, the successful photographer enjoys the spice of life that flavors the cup of the painter and the poet. He is allied to those in whom are those divine gifts of creative genius, those who produce some lovely lyric or exquisite picture, in a way, out of nothing. A man with a knack for handling tools, or for carving in wood, for chemistry, for entomological research, is a happy man. I knew a stonemason who was a collector of moths and butterflies, and who had an extensive correspondence with other collectors. Some of them famous professors; others, noblemen in foreign lands, the habitués of courts. The stonemason met these men on equal terms. They had a common subject of great and absorbing interest. Their fad was to them an initiation in true brotherhood.

Most lads, as they grow up, show a tendency toward some particular pursuit, which is aside from their school work, and which is more or less a fad. They sometimes appropriate more space in the house than their mothers find it agreeable to spare; but the sensible mother will not mind a little litter, nor be disturbed at a little noise. She knows where her boy is, and what he is doing, and who his companions are, and her mind is at ease about him.

Music is of all fads the most desirable for a man in the hours of relaxation from his work. Blessings on the banjo, on the mandolin, on the pianola, on any instrument which an amateur can learn to manipulate, without spending on the task long and laborious days. A fad unbends the mind; it diverts from annoyance and it drives away ennui.

Flowers for the Living

Flowers for the living, yes, and not flowers only, but all that flowers stand for, of grace, kindness, and sweet meaning. I fancy that if the dead could hear us, they would very often be astonished to find how noble we thought them, how full of loveliness and of every virtue, how great and profound had been our esteem. We never told them our opinion. We kept our admiration to ourselves. What a good thing it would be for us, every one, to make it our rule each day to say some complimentary word to our next of kin, to praise where now we are silent, to show our love where now we conceal it. Flowers for the living, while they are here for us to love. Out with the stones that cumber too many a path. Let us make it smooth for toilworn feet. Let the wife, the husband, the parent, the brother, the sister, the child, know that we care for them, that we prize them, that we have nothing else in the world so valuable as the sweet home love.

Love at Home

"My dear Emily," wrote a lady recently to a distant niece, "you want to know about Eleanor and her family. It's all true that you say they have been poor, they have had illness. John hasn't been a successful man, but they have had one thing beyond all price—they have had plenty of love at home."

What in the whole world can compare with this? The man who has hard work to get along, the children who early take their share of the rough as well as of the smooth, the house where there is scanty luxury, though comfort may not be wanting, you see it all in a glance. But if there be love in the home, there is wealth there. Should the richest man in America die he could carry none of his wealth with him; and he might own great wealth here on earth, yet be a poor man all his days. Poor in love, poor in the consideration of mankind, poor in spiritual comprehension and the soul's assets. The special gladness of heaven will be, that there shall be love at home, and forever, in that bright land. No quarrels, no misunderstandings, no foolish bickering, but the home folk all at home and love reigning without end.

Etiquette of Calls

As a rule, the call of formality, as of a stranger upon a new comer in a place, should be returned within a week. When one has dined or lunched with a friend, a call should be paid at the house during the following week or fortnight. A lady, calling at a house where she is not intimate, sends in two of her husband's cards, and one of her own. It is usually not necessary to send or leave a half dozen visiting cards at one house, unless a formal call is intended on every lady member of the family. A request to see the ladies, and a single card, satisfies the needs of the occasion. When your call is paid upon a lady visiting in your town, leave a card for her hostess as well as herself, even though you are not acquainted with the latter. In planning to show an attention in the way of some pleasant invitation to the guest, be sure to include her hostess, who may or may not accept. That is at her discretion.

Small Economies

AN amusing instance of our American wastefulness was chronicled the other day in the newspaper record of current events. A manufacturing company in New Jersey, finding its back-yard encumbered by a constantly augmenting ash-heap, sold it to a contractor for five dollars. It was supposed that the ashes would be used to fill up vacant lots. But there happened to be in that same ash-heap a large amount of half-burned coal, as well as a percentage of coal that had simply been thrown away, and the fortunate purchaser had it sifted, and, during the coal-famine, sold the precious finding of his sieve for a hundred dollars.

There is a lesson here for the average housekeeper who, in this land of plenty, despises little savings. We have grown accustomed to our inexhaustible stores of food and fuel, to spending as we go, and to having all we want always at our hand, and so we do not save as we might. There are two ways of good housewifery which we might with profit adopt, according to our circumstances. One is that method of buying by wholesale, which is good economy where people have pantries and cellars, and can manage their stock themselves, not having it endangered by wasteful subordinates. The other is the plan of careful buying in very tiny quantities, as the Parisien does, counting accurately every chop, every egg, every wee pat of butter, so that there is exactly enough for each person, but nothing left over. In cities, where people live in close quarters and space is valuable, this manner of providing has its advantages, but some of our bountiful country matrons, who are accustomed to abundance, would not like its petty accountings. The housekeeper who pays as she buys, never having accounts anywhere, and doing her own marketing, will find herself better off in the long run than the one who has weekly or monthly bills. For all of us, there is great wit and wisdom in thrift, and our recent labor difficulties will not have been in vain if they have taught us this.

A Common Fear

A common experience of childhood is to suffer acutely from terror of the dark. In Eothen, Kinglake, the gifted author and traveler, told how he felt when the Pyramids first oppressed him with their vastness. So had he felt, as a little lad under five, when left alone in the dark at night. The hugeness of the black night, the immensity of space, had frightened the child, and he never had been able to overcome his fear of it until he had emerged from childhood. Imaginative children are often a prey to this sort of agony. Not always is the blame to be attributed to foolish or ignorant persons, who tell them as little "Orphant Annie" does in James Whitcomb Riley's ballad, "the goblins will catch you, if you don't watch out."

To insure a child's goodness or its silence, an unscrupulous woman has sometimes filled its mind with stories and pictures, never to be effaced. Or, there may be some weird occurrence in a neighborhood, which leaves lasting traces in childish memory, and for the worse, and not the better.

When I was a child, a ghastly murder was committed in the country a few miles from my home. I was not supposed to hear anything about it, yet I did hear every gruesome detail—of the stealthy onset, the sharp axe, the prowling robbers, and the murdered family. People barricaded their doors, and kept lights burning all night long, when the weird of this tale was still fresh; and long after it, we, children, went to sleep with shudders, and wakened thankful to be alive in the morning light.

Still, none of these, so to speak, realities need be invoked to make the darkness a terror to an imaginative child. Out of the mind's own domain are many spectral fancies invoked, and the intangible and undefined is in itself enough. Always leave a friendly candle, where its glimmer may carry comfort to a wakeful child, is a good rule for every home.

IN A SOUTHERN GARDEN

Listen, sister, hear you not footsteps coming? It is one Who is bringing tidings good. Foemen conquered! Victory won!

A VANISHED HOPE

SWEET with the scents of the summer,
White with the dew and the sun,
Wee as the robes of the fairies,
She folded them, one by one.

Royally rich was the raiment,
Though none but herself might see,
How the heart with the hand had labored
For the Prince that was yet to be.

Into those tiny garments
Were more than by needle wrought,
Hours of loving fancies,
Beautiful flights of thought.

By lane and road were burning,
In splendor of crimson dyes,
Maple and elm and sumac,
Shaming the sunset skies.

She smiled from her chamber window,
"Ah, fade, bright leaves!" she said,
"For I'll be glad with my baby
When all the leaves are dead!"

Cold is the heaven above her,
Cloudy and dark the day,
As she looks again, in sorrow
That is slow to pass away.

Useless the treasures of linen,
And the cobweb frosts of lace;
Her babe, on mother's bosom
Found briefest resting-place.

All night she hears the north wind,
She feels the rain and the snow;
When they fall on the bed of her darling,
Over her heart they go.

Sleep hath no fetter to bind her,
Ever its spells will break;
At the dream of a touch like a roseleaf
The grief returns to ache.

Comfort her not with the angels,
Since, changing her day to night,
Some pitiless angel carried
Her first-born out of her sight.

THE 20TH CENTURY WIFE AND MOTHER

Written Specially by MARION HARLAND for The Christian Herald

The Young Wife's Cares

"UPON one thing my mind is made up, and cannot be changed," I heard a young man say the other day. "I shall never, in any circumstances, marry an invalid."

"Suppose she falls and breaks her back during the honeymoon?" suggested a bystander, jocularly.

"Then, I shall bow to the afflictive dispensation of providence. If I knowingly marry a sickly woman, I put the noose about my own neck, and deserve the punishment of my folly."

A bevy of girls in whose hearing the remark was repeated, tossed scornful heads at the "cold-blooded monster." He deserved to go wifeless all his days, and they devoutly hoped he would.

In the silent depths of my heart, I approved his resolution, although I might question his taste in expressing it so bluntly.

The man who marries a sickly woman, knowing her to be sickly, commits rank folly. The best regulated home may, in the providence of God, become a hospital, or a private sanitarium. The man and woman who found it in the beginning should be of sound body and sane mind. The mother who does not impress upon the mind of her daughter and of her son, the prime importance of this truth, is derelict in her duty to them and to her grandchildren.

Our modern matron is less ignorant as to physiological facts than her grandmothers were. She knows the fearful wonders of her making; she has "studied up" on evolution, and ought to have at least a glimmering preception of what each individual woman owes to her race and to those who shall come after her. She is less absurdly squeamish in discussing the subject than was the custom with would-be modest women who entered the marriage state fifty years ago. If she be a sensible girl who loves the man she marries and wishes to help him on in life, she regards her health as part of the fortune she brings him. In this respect she has no right to come to him dowerless.

"I have told my future son-in-law how little he may expect of assistance from Elise in getting on in the world," said a society mother, airily. "If she will marry a poor man, he takes her with his eyes open. She averages two days in bed every week; it would prostrate her for the day to get up to an early breakfast. She has never made a bed, or swept a room in her life. She has scarcely known a really well day since she was fourteen."

"I wonder you are not afraid to have her marry," I ventured to say.

She shrugged her shoulders. "Marriage is a lottery in more ways than one. They take the risks for themselves."

A year later I paid a visit of condolence to the philosophical parent. While we talked, the feeble wailings of a month-old baby in the adjoining nursery pierced our hearts. Down-town a fine young fellow, a widower and homeless before he was thirty years old, was trying to fight his way in the battle of business, strained and distracted by the ever-gnawing pain in his heart. The boy and girl had taken "risks" they knew little of. The mother who allowed them to do it, was the most culpable of the three.

Next in value to our matron's capital of sound health and good sense, I rate practical knowledge of housewifery in all its branches. A common mistake made by wiser heads than those set upon girlish shoulders, is that the numberless labor and time-saving devices offered by benevolent house-furnishers for the house-mother's relief, virtually abolish the necessity of education in the art of cookery and the other duties that enter into the management of a household.

If the patentees who have sought out these thousand-and-one inventions are to be credited, the "Peerless Helper" will cook a five-course dinner by steam while Madame is at church, or paying afternoon calls; potatoes will pare themselves; cereals need no cooking, and Regal Raisers reduce bread-making to a bagatelle. The plain truth being that the girl who goes to housekeeping without knowing how to prepare the simplest meal, who has no idea whether a steak is cut from the back or the leg of an ox, and confounds chops with the cheek of a sheep—will find herself the worse, instead of better off, for the multiplication of machines. Her fore-mother's task was easier, by far. She could not go far afield when oven, frying-pan, skillet and pot made up her list of available utensils.

Shall I fall under the lash of many with whom I would fain stand well, when I say that, up to this time, cook-housewife or cook, who is ready of apprehension and eager to avail herself of new ideas, may learn much that will improve her culinary skill and add to the comfort of her family. If she be as ignorant of the rudiments of kitchen-lore as the average college-girl, she would better save her father's money, and spend her own time in her mother's kitchen, watching a "good plain cook" than squander six hours a week and twenty-five dollars a course, in attendance upon Madame Jones-Smith-Soyer's demonstration lectures.

I have seen graduates from such "courses" who could not boil a potato mealy, or toast a slice of bread into crisp deliciousness to save their diplomas.

So much of the happiness—I say nothing of the physical well-being—but the happiness of a home depends upon the house-mother's proficiency in this respect, that I bear strongly and persistently upon the subject. It is not kind—it is not fair—it is not honest to undertake to run a man's house if you are not capable of doing it. Let easy-going advisers say what they may, housekeeping does not—as Dogberry asserted of reading and writing—"come by nature." Nor can it be learned from books alone, any more than stage-driving or engineering or mining, or gardening can be learned by reading the best treatises on the subject.

This is a frank and friendly statement from one who has devoted much time and thought to the writing of household manuals. I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I add that a grave mistake in preparing a cookery book is to take for granted that the student of the recipes and directions therein contained knows even the rudiments of her business. The same objection applies to the ordinary cooking-school.

To sum up the matter—if you would know how to cook—DO IT! And it is better for you to spoil the materials that go wrong in this "doing," in your mother's kitchen than in John's. He puts housekeeping money into your hands, and with it what is far more valuable, his digestion and his health.

The table is a highly-important part of your establishment. Do not fall into the way of thinking that other departments are not worth considering. A Northern housekeeper, who had removed to Virginia, said to me with a puzzled look: "They seem to think here that cooking is housekeeping. I have always thought it is only one branch of it."

On the other hand, an English woman in Lucerne, Switzerland, described a boarding-house to me as "a nasty pension! Neat as wax—don't you know? but there was not enough to eat."

Our young matron should have, to begin with, a wholesome horror of dirt. Dirt has been well defined as "matter in the wrong place." Garden mould is admirable—indispensable—in its place. When my grandsons and their pet collie transport it to my library floor—it is dirt!—undeniable and highly objectionable. When I found a volume of Froude in library binding, upon the lawn, where the student had left it, I gave it the same name, and did not withhold the epithet upon the discovery of one of the cook's clean linen collars in the flour barrel. "It had fallen from the store-room shelf!" I was assured. It was dirty disorder to leave it upon that shelf.

Our matron cannot adopt a stronger and better general principle than "A place for everything and everything in its place." Like the Golden Rule, it holds good everywhere and always.

If John were not guided by this law in the conduct of his business, he would soon have no business to conduct.

In obeying the call to Matronhood, you enter a profession; you assume the duties and the responsibilities of a Business.

Good Wishes from North Dakota

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—I have received from you a set of your premium pictures. Please accept my thanks. I consider THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the most attractive religious weekly for the family that we have. And when you add such premiums as you usually give, it is not surprising that you have a large subscription list. May you go on doing good.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—Your Art Portfolio received in this morning's mail. It is a very fine piece of work and much better than I had expected, but it convinces me that whenever THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes an offer of premiums you may always depend upon them being better than they represent them.

A Prayer that Made a Fool Clever

THERE is a story told of a man that afterwards became eminent in public life, but who, in very early childhood, was counted little better than a fool. He was always to be found at the foot of his class, and was the butt of the boys, and was to the teacher, what seemed to him, "a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him"—not by reason of his viciousness, but by his invincible stupidity.

He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow. She did her best to stimulate his sluggish powers, if indeed, his mental faculties deserved the name of powers at all, but apparently in vain. On one occasion, when the school in which he was a pupil was to give an entertainment, the poor mother besought the principal to give her boy "a piece to speak," hoping thus to make him feel that he was not an utter "derelict." The officer appealed to reluctantly consented, and the mother undertook the task of teaching him the piece, but, after hours of patient labor, not a line was the boy able to repeat. At the last, the mother frantic with despair, dropped on her knees and cried: "Oh, God, have pity upon me, for my poor boy is a fool."

The boy overheard her, and, in sympathy with her, felt as if his heart would break; and something did break, only it was not his heart, but something in his head, as he declared afterwards. All the blood in his body seemed to rush to his brain, and something gave way, and his mind was flooded as with sudden sunburst, and throwing his arms about his mother's neck, he exclaimed: "Mother, I can say it now," and say it he did, every word of it without a break, and many other things he delightedly repeated that he had vainly tried to learn at school, and from that hour, as with preternaturally quickened faculties, he forged ahead until he became the foremost scholar in the school, and afterwards rose to be one of the most distinguished jurists in the land. — From a sermon by the Rev. P. S. Henson, D.D.

A "God Bless You!" from Oregon

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—For your kindness in sending me the Red Letter Bible, I cannot find words in which to express my thanks, and then what should come but the "Art-Portfolio," and God only knows that my heart is filled with gratitude that such things can be. Well, "God bless you and keep you!" is my fervent prayer. REV. A. NOTESTINE.

Grateful Words from Tennessee

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—I am this morning in receipt of the Red Letter Bible, and am delighted with it. Have already shown it to several friends, who pronounce it a very handsome book. I hope the result may be that you will place many more of them here in Knoxville. Also have received the Art Pictures, and certainly feel that if I haven't received the worth of my money this time, I never did in my life. Congratulating you on your very handsome edition, I am, etc.,

"HELD UP" BY ARAB BRIGANDS

THE EXCITING EXPERIENCES OF PROFESSOR ROBINSON WHILE CROSSING THE SINAITIC DESERT

...By...

Prof. George L.
Robinson, Ph.D.

THERE was no little excitement in the court-yard of the Convent of St. Catharine the morning we set out from Sinai. We had risen early in order to get a good start. The Arabs had been informed of our departure, and were present, eager to hire to us all their camels, if we would take them. For over two hours the Oikonomos of the monastery stood in the capacity of arbiter in the midst of a clamoring host of volunteers. Time became more and more precious to us as the sun climbed towards the zenith and their disputations seemed unabated; but in the desire to economise time we were decidedly in the minority. Nine o'clock came, and the last camel was still to be decided upon. A fierce contest ensued. This was their final opportunity, and each Arab who had a camel to hire eagerly pressed upon Hanna, our dragoman, and Sheikh Salim the merits of his own particular beast. At length we passed out of the convent gate, but it was presently discovered that the girths of some of our riding camels needed to be tightened and the burdens of others readjusted. Several minutes were consumed in righting these matters. Finally, all was in readiness, the storm of the Arabs quieted down, we bade adieu to the monks (having paid them royally for their hospitality), and our caravan of fourteen camels set out.

We passed down Wady ed-Deir, and in a few minutes reached the "hill of Aaron," at the edge of the plain of Er-Rahah. Turning to the right, we entered Wady esh-Sheikh, a valley of considerable breadth and affording much pasturage. About two miles from the base of Sinai we passed on the left, just opposite the mouth of Wady Sadad, which opens into Wady esh-Sheikh from the east, a high mountain, so conspicuous and imposing that one uninfluenced by the tradition of the monks might willingly choose it as the Mountain of the Law. Further on we visited the tomb of Nebi Salih, a place of annual sacrifice for the Arabs, and the pass of El-Watiyah, identified by Edward Robinson as the true site of Rephidim, but in our opinion the identification is extremely doubtful.

Retracing our steps a short distance, we turned towards the northeast, and entered Wady Saal. Two days' steady traveling from this point brought us through the more imposing mountain districts of Sinai, to an oasis located about midway between Jebel Musa and the head of the Gulf of Akabah, one of the most picturesque spots in the entire Peninsula. The mountain rocks en route had often impressed us with their grandeur, some of them resembling human temples and pyramids, but those bounding the oasis of Ain Hudhera, or Hazeroth, were even more magnificent. On a huge boulder just near the southwestern entrance to the depression in which Hazeroth is situated, we found several Hebrew inscriptions, chiefly of proper names, however, accompanied by numerous Hebrew candlesticks with seven branches. So far as we can discover, these have never before been observed by travelers.

The oasis of Ain Hudhera lies sunken among the mountains, and consists of three copious fountains, and a few gardens with numerous palm trees. The entire depression is about one mile long from northeast to southwest, by four hundred yards in average width, and is bounded by rock escarpments from four to six hundred feet in height. The bottom is sandy, and usually barren. The coloring of the limestone rocks is exquisite, the different strata being white, red, yellow, purple, green, orange, pink, brown, lavender, chocolate and maroon, and arranged as only the Divine Artist could conceive.

We descended from the surrounding table-land into the depression of Hazeroth over an uninviting cliff, at the southwest extremity, through which a kind of path had been cut, in part natural, in part artificial. The drop was too sudden to allow of loaded animals to pass, consequently our caravan took another route. We arrived at the springs at about 12:20 o'clock, and took luncheon under an immense palm cluster, twelve trees growing out of a single stump. The day was unusually hot, as we discovered later, when we undertook to investigate the other two springs, and the immense perpendicular rock on the northeast side of the depression, called by the Arabs "Bab er-Rum," or "Gate of the Romans," so named, because they think there is a subterranean passage under the cliff leading to Europe. The few Arabs loitering about the fountains, and watching the gardens in the vicinity, were the most ignorant, decrepit and afflicted whom we saw in the entire Peninsula. Historically, the place was interesting, because of its association with the children of Israel. It was at Hazeroth that Moses was rebuked for having taken an Ethiopian wife, and it was there that Miriam was smitten with leprosy.

On leaving Hazeroth, the road led us through a weary succession of Wadies in the direction of Akabah northeast, but in order to avoid the Turkish soldiers stationed at that place, who are wont to discourage foreigners traveling in those parts, and would doubtless have arrested us and escorted us back to Sinai had they discovered us, we turned northward and came out of the mountainous district upon the table-land of Badiet et-Tih, or, as the name indicates, the Wilderness of the Wanderings. We halted for Sabbath at a place called Bir-eth-Themed, a little over one day's journey west of Akabah, and just south of the Hajj, or Pilgrim's route from Cairo to Mecca. The rest was welcome, though in mid-desert and compelled to close the doors of our tents a portion of the day, in order to protect ourselves against the driving sand of a scorching sirocco. Our Arab servants improved the day by devising a scheme to extort from us additional bakshish. They had now reached the boundary of their own territory, and were beginning to feel timid about escorting strangers across territory belonging to neighboring tribes. We had already deviated a trifle from the original contract, in order to follow more closely in the footsteps of the children of Israel, and accordingly they took advantage of their opportunity. About nine o'clock that Sabbath evening they laid before us the following alternatives: either make a five days' detour by the castle at Nakhel (which would have cost us at the usual rate of $35 per day), or return to the convent, or pay $90 bakshish, and they would take us directly via Kadesh through to Gaza. After considerable hesitation, we chose the last of the three alternatives, and promised to deliver over the money when we should arrive at Jerusalem, which we did. But even after promising this, our troubles were not at an end. Abeed, our Hobab, whom we had secured at Sinai "to be to us instead of eyes," and who had there declared that he knew the way perfectly, now assured us that he was totally ignorant of the region which we were wishing to cross, and was unwilling to hazard the undertaking. Monday morning came, and he sat sullenly upon the ground unwilling to guide us further. Hanna pressed Turkish dollars into his hand, kissed him on both cheeks, and finally, after many discouraging attempts, succeeded in getting him to consent to start. But he repeatedly affirmed that he knew nothing of the course. For two days thereafter we followed the directions of my compass. We had a good map, fortunately, and felt sure as we proceeded that we were not far from the proper course. The experience, however, was similar to being on a disabled steamer in mid-ocean.

The desert grew more and more bleak and dreary. Shortly after crossing the Hajj route we entered the territory of the Haiwat tribe. We shuddered at the thought of being caught trespassing upon their territory. Once they opposed us, but being few in number, were easily pacified. It was not until we had crossed into the territory of the Teyahah tribe and had passed the salt wells of Biyar el-Malaha that we met with any serious opposition. Here a whole tent village came out against us. They ran ahead of our caravan, turned our burdened camels back as though about to appropriate them, and attempted to make our own camels kneel in order to dislodge us from our saddles. For twenty minutes there seemed to be little possibility of passing them. Hanna, our dragoman, disputed with them at the height of his voice, disclaiming that they had any right to recognition. On the other hand, they insisted most vigorously that no one of all Allah's creatures had

Lead Me, O My Saviour

"For thy name's sake lead me."—Ps. 31: 3.

FANNY J. CROSBY

CHAS. H. GABRIEL

1. Lead me, O my Saviour, lead me, Closer would I cling to Thee,
2. Lead me, O my Saviour, lead me, Keep my heart from every snare;
3. Lead me, O my Saviour, lead me, Till at last, my journey o'er,

Ere the shadows gather round me And my way I can not see.
Fierce temptations oft as sail me And I need Thy constant care.
I shall see, a-dore and praise Thee With the ransomed ever more.

the right to conduct travelers across their territory except themselves (which, according to the unwritten law of the Arabs, is usually recognized), and that a change of camels was absolutely necessary. The contest of words between them and our dragoman continued. Finally Hanna dismounted from his camel, put his arms over the shoulders of the ringleader of the band, walked off a short distance, slipped a few pieces of money into his hands, and thus satisfied him. He returned to mount, but was unable to do so until he had pacified another strong member of their ungracious crowd. In like manner he took him aside, pressed gold into his palm, and in a few minutes succeeded in silencing not only him, but through him, the whole crowd.

Coming to the plain of Kadesh, this experience was practically repeated. For hardly had we selected a favorable spot in which to pitch our tents, when two Arabs appeared on the scene and stood close by, watching our movements with jealous eye. On discovering our intentions to visit the Spring of Kadesh, called in Arabic Ain Kadis, they immediately began to demur. Others of their clan gathered about our servants' fire. The whole night until near daybreak was spent in negotiating with them. Offers of silver and then of gold were peremptorily rejected. The Arabs had not come to terms, and probably would resist us if we should attempt to venture up the Wady. We were bidden to strike with our palm clubs any one who should seize our camels, or cause them to kneel. Meanwhile, one more attempt would be made to arrange matters amicably. Just then three of our most hostile opposers appeared before the door of our tent. One of them had brought with him a sack of tobacco, which he wished to sell. Hanna saw his opportunity. He quickly bought it at the Arab's own price, and gave it to our servants to divide. This pleased the enemy and he capitulated. A little later we had broken camp and were off in the direction of Wady Kadis, where the spring was located.

The importance of the site is second to none in the history of Israel's wanderings. Here Israel halted to send forth the spies (Deut. 1: 19). Here some of their number proposed to appoint a new captain and return to Egypt (Num. 14: 4). Here Israel probably encamped during the thirty and eight years of their wanderings, making it their central rendezvous. Here Korah and his company rebelled (Num. 16: 11). Aaron's rod budded (Num. 17: 14). Miriam died (Num. 20: 1), and Moses smote the rock (Num. 20: 1-12).

"THE

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV.
C. H.
YATMAN

PSALM XVII.

The Psalm of Integrity

1. Hear the right, O Lord, attend unto my cry; give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips.

2. Let my sentence come forth from thy presence; let thine eyes behold the things that are equal.

3. Thou hast proved mine heart; thou hast visited me in the night; thou hast tried me, and shalt find nothing; I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress.

"HEAR THE RIGHT, O LORD"

It is a tremendous thing to be right and know it. Let one live in the three opening verses of this Psalm of Integrity, and the closing verse, telling of another world, will be as real as the sun at noonday in a cloudless sky.

"Obedience is better than sacrifice," for therein is the assurance of faith. When one's conscience is void of offence toward God and man, "he has the strength of ten because his heart is pure."

Oh sinner! ask God to make you good and keep you so.

PSALM XVIII.

The Deliverance Psalm

4. The sorrows of death compassed me, and the floods of ungodly men made me afraid.

5. The sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me.

"IN MY DISTRESS"

6 In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God; he heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before him, even into his ears.

Here is a Psalm for all folk in a tight place. Paul must have lived in the truth of these fifty verses. John Bunyan could never have written his Pilgrim's Progress without this Scripture.

Millions of saved and glorified saints must, even now, point out this Psalm as their road to heaven. It is true that God helps those who help themselves, but the glory of the Gospel is that God helps those who cannot help themselves.

Hard-pressed saint, listen! "Deliverance will come."

PSALM XIX.

The Day Psalm

2. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.

14. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer.

"DAY UNTO DAY"

—yea, than much fine gold." This Psalm goes with "The Great Psalm," which is the 119. Surely it is a Psalm of Day, and of gold.

The reason why God's Word is more to be desired than wealth is because by it comes a "good name," and that is to be chosen above great riches. Gold will pass out with a burning world, but a good name will live when the stars have gone to sleep forever.

PSALM XX.

The Strengthening Psalm

5. We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners; the Lord fulfil all thy petitions.

"SET UP OUR BANNERS"

6. Now know I that the Lord saveth his anointed; he will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand.

Many weak Christians need the truth of Psalm 20. The church is a hospital for them, when they should be strong and stand with God's soldiers as they go out to set their banners over the nations of the earth.

If God can help Jacob, he can help any one.

If he promises help and strength in his sanctuary, then it is wise to go to the house of God.

A NEW CITY OF JERUSALEM

THE City of Jerusalem is to be portrayed at the World's Fair in St. Louis in 1904. Competent talent has been engaged, and the association formed is one that does not propose to make money out of the exhibit, but to teach the people of the western world how the people of that ancient city live and act. Men of millions, who are identified in church work, are engaged in the enterprise, and an imitation city of Jerusalem, with many of the things actually in use there, is to be brought across the waters. The managers have engaged Mme. Lydia Von Finkelstein Mountford to take charge of the work. This lady was born in Jerusalem and has lived there most of her life. In recent years she has been traveling. Her idea is to give a perfect dramatic representation of life in the Holy Land. Ten acres of land are to be taken at the fair, around which there will be erected a huge wall. Inside will be native-born residents of Jerusalem, who have come here for this sole purpose. Representations of weddings, feast days, funerals, and the religious life of the people of the Holy City will be given. There will be five hundred Oriental natives representing the various classes. The reproduction of the Holy Sepulchre, the Mosque of Omar, the Mount of Olives and the Via Dolorosa will involve the importation of several shiploads of material direct from the Holy Land. The exhibition will cost more than one million dollars to reproduce the city of Jerusalem in miniature.

All About Wild Animals

The NEW Natural History

By RICHARD LYDEKKER, F.Z.S., assisted by more than a score of the ablest naturalists in the world, is the latest and best work of its kind. It is a fascinating wonder-book, telling about all the marvels of the animal world, many of which have been but recently discovered. It is strictly scientific, yet written in a style that is so pleasing and simple that children can read and understand and delight in it.

ERNEST SETON-THOMPSON

in his introduction to the work calls it "Easily the best and most reliable work in the field of popular Natural History."

All the different sorts of animals are described and compared, from polyp to pachyderm: How they are related to each other; how they come to differ so widely from one another; how they protect and care for their young; how and where they make their homes; how they rule their communities; the different part of the world that each sort inhabits; their methods of moving about; their migrations from place to place; the uses of their odd limbs and singular faculties; their wonderful intelligence in their own ways of life; what they eat and their wise ways of getting it; how they quarrel and battle among themselves; how they shrewdly defend themselves against their foes; how they are hunted and trapped; how they serve man with food, shelter, clothing, finery and other useful and beautiful things; all these interesting matters and many more are fully told about.

72 Magnificent Full-Page Colored Plates

The work is in six royal octavo volumes of over 500 pages each. They are beautifully but substantially bound in half-morocco, with gold backs. There are over 2200 illustrations—the most magnificent set of animal pictures ever made. Seventy-two of them are full-page Colored Plates in from ten to sixteen colors.

Special Offer: Half Price and Little Payments

If you apply at once, you can secure a set by paying $1 club fee and $2 a month for fifteen months—the club fee of $1 being the only payment required before the complete set is sent you. This is one-half the regular selling price, and the offer will remain open for a short time only. If you want more details before ordering, send your name and address on this three-cornered ticket. You will receive free a beautiful sample page book and a fuller account of the nature of the work. But be prompt.

A College Course at Home

A Practical System for those who wish to Educate Themselves

COURSE II.—A Practical Elementary Education

Outlined by FRANCIS RANSOM LANE, M.A., M.D., Principal of the Brooklyn Polytechnic Preparatory School

[The following course of Home Study forms an alternative to the course suggested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 22. Different text-books are recommended—a slightly different method of study is suggested. If, after you have begun the course, any difficulties should arise, write us and we will gladly help you over them, or advise whenever necessary. It is not a mail-educational course but a self-educational course on the lines suggested. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Education Department, Bible House, New York City.]

It is possible for people who, by circumstances, have been compelled to engage in the serious duties and employments of life without receiving any systematic education, to make up for this loss, even at a more or less advanced age, by devoting an hour or two a day to close study.

A thorough elementary knowledge of the subjects outlined below should enable the student to face the world as an intelligent citizen. The course is not intended for those who have had a thorough common school education; at the same time it includes subjects adapted for their further education, and the student must decide for himself what particular study or studies would be most to his advantage to take up. A regular plan of study has been drawn up for those who want to take the whole course, and who can devote two hours a day to their self-education.

Perhaps it would be wise for many students not to take up Algebra or a language, but rather to emphasize History, Arithmetic, and Literature throughout the entire year. Those who begin French or German should do so with the idea of ultimately devoting more time than is here set down for these subjects. A foundation for profitable study of foreign tongues can be laid in six months, but unless it is possible to build upon this foundation it would be better to devote the time to the English branches.

The English language is the basis of all practical education and culture; Arithmetic is essential to the business man; the study of history helps to make a good citizen.

The Subjects

English Grammar and Literature; Arithmetic; Ancient, English and American History; Geography.

Supplementary Subjects

Physiology; Zoology; Botany; French or German; Algebra.

A CONVENIENT PLAN FOR A YEAR'S COURSE

40 Minutes for Each Subject:

| | 1st Six Months | | | 2d Six Months | | |
|-----------|-----------------|------------|-----------|-----------------|------------|---------|
| MONDAY | Eng. Grammar | Arithmetic | History | Eng. Grammar | Algebra | History |
| TUESDAY | Eng. Literature | Arithmetic | Geography | Eng. Literature | or | History |
| WEDNESDAY | Eng. Grammar | Physiology | History | Botany | a Language | History |
| THURSDAY | Eng. Literature | Arithmetic | Geography | Eng. Grammar | " | History |
| FRIDAY | Eng. Grammar | Zoology | History | Eng. Literature | " | History |
| SATURDAY | Recreation | | | Recreation | | |
| SUNDAY | Rest | | | Rest | | |

The following text-books should give the home student a good elementary knowledge of any of the various subjects mentioned. The array of books is discouraging on account of its magnitude. But by no means is it necessary to buy, borrow, or have on hand all the books at the same time. To begin with, obtain a grammar, one English masterpiece, an arithmetic, a geography, a book on zoology or physiology, and a United States History; and do not obtain any others until you have made sufficient advance in these. It may be that you already have, or can easily borrow, text-books covering exactly the same ground as those mentioned below, and any experienced teacher could help you in making out a list for yourself.

Text-books Suggested

English, Grammar, etc.

Buehler's Grammar. (Newson & Co., New York.)
Powell's How to Write. (Baker, Sheldon & Co., New York.)

For the more advanced, Reed & Kellogg's Higher Lessons. (Maynard, Merrill & Co., New York.)

WOMAN'S WAR ON ALCOHOL

The Annual Convention of the W. C. T. U. at Portland, Me.

PORTLAND, Me., was recently the scene of the twenty-ninth annual Convention of the National W. C. T. U.; the total number of delegates present being 447, of whom forty-two were presidents of States, and twenty-six national superintendents of departments. There were many visitors. The Convention opened Friday morning, Oct. 17, in the Jefferson Opera House. The annual address of the president, Mrs. Lillian M. N.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET

Stevens, was the main feature of the morning session. She dealt with the Congressional appropriation for providing comfortable amusement rooms for the soldiers and an improved regulation; Government regulation of vice in the Philippines; prohibition in Maine, where "the whole liquor business is under the ban of the statute, and the liquor dealer is an outlaw. I hope," said Mrs. Stevens, "the good people of Maine will never consent to make the nefarious business lawful, as they certainly can never make it respectable."

When Lady Henry Somerset and her two English companions in travel, Rev. Henry Sanders and Miss Campbell, were presented, all the delegates saluted with small American flags, instead of with fluttering handkerchiefs, as is customary. Lady Henry spoke brief words of greeting and offered the noontide prayer. She told the Convention that in America it is impossible to appreciate the difficulties under which the British Women's Temperance Association labors, as there they have to convert the women to total abstinence before they can be set to work in the Association, while in America the great majority of Christian women are already abstainers.

On Friday evening, various addresses of welcome were received. Miss Cornelia Dow, daughter of General Neal Dow, who was the Father of Prohibition in Maine, gave a reception on Saturday afternoon, at her residence on Dow street, to the whole Convention.

The pulpits of Portland were filled on Sunday morning by well-known women speakers. In the afternoon Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, preached the annual sermon in the Jefferson. The evening meeting was held in the City Hall. Lady Henry Somerset and Rev. Henry Sanders were the speakers. Lady Henry advocated united action by organized Christianity against evil in its entirety. She asked, "Why is it so few people place themselves on the side which is fighting against this terrible thing?" then said: "It is because if they do so, they must sacrifice something—political aspirations or social status, something which they think necessary to their happiness." She urged those who love the right to make the sacrifice in order to advance the good of humanity. She referred with astonishment to a recent public declaration of Bishop Potter, that he "did not blame the poor, who have so little in life, for seeking variety in getting drunk." She said Christ would not have uttered such words, and the bishop would better have tried to persuade some of the millionaires of New York to provide places of recreation for the poor, where they might have variety that would uplift, not drag down.

The demonstration of department work called out an immense audience on Monday evening, and as each living picture came upon the stage, the superintendent of the department briefly told of the work of the year. Scientific temperance instruction in the public schools was demonstrated by children carrying flags from all the countries represented among our immigrants. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt spoke of the schools as the great influence which makes Americans of these children, then asked, "Are you Poles, Italians, Russians, Germans and French now?" "No," shouted the children, "we are Americans," and each waved the "Stars and Stripes." Then Uncle Sam appeared, and thanked the W. C. T. U. for helping him train the children in temperate and hygienic habits.

Tuesday brought election of officers, resulting in the re-election of all. There were only two changes in National Superintendents, Franchise and Flower Mission. Wednesday evening brought the Convention to a close with Benefit Night. Illinois had the place of honor, having gained 1,770 new members during the year.

Answered Prayers

L. K., Maryland, N. Y., writes:

The Lord has answered my prayers, lifting many troublesome cares. Once when our home was in danger of destruction by fire, and no means at hand could save it, unless the wind changed, I prayed earnestly for that change; and in a few moments the wind changed and our home was spared.

T. H., Baltimore, Md., writes:

As our faith has been encouraged and strengthened by the "answers to prayer," we wish to add our experience, hoping to help others in them. In a case of urgent necessity we "cried unto the Lord, and he heard us" and granted the exact request we had made of him.

Mrs. J. E. C., Harvard, Ill., writes:

God has heard and answered my prayers many times. Especially in the last few weeks has he given me my heart's desire in two important matters.

SCHOOL TEACHERS LEARN Just Like Other People.

Bad food and overwork wreck many a life, but the right food makes sure and complete happiness, for one must be happy if perfectly well.

"Grape-Nuts saved my life, and changed me from a nervous, sick, despondent woman to a healthy, strong and cheerful one," writes Mrs. Alice Riegel, of Pontiac, Ill. "I had not been well for several years and I thought, as did my friends, that 'my days were numbered.' My ill health was caused from drinking coffee, eating improper food and overwork in the school room; I had become very weak, tired and nervous and nothing I ate agreed with me. Medicine made me more nervous and impaired my digestive organs.

It was with difficulty that a neighbor induced me to try Grape-Nuts and I liked it from the first with thick cream and sugar. I lived on it exclusively with Postum Food Coffee until my digestion was so much improved I could eat other foods. My friends soon noticed the improvement in my looks, and I am now healthy, strong and happy. I attribute the change in my health solely to the change of diet.

Husband and I both like Grape-Nuts and Postum. I think they are the most healthful and strengthening of all foods and drinks and suitable for the weak as well as for the strong.

This photograph shows a corner in the library of a wealthy woman's home. The artistically-arranged pictures on the walls are Cosmos Pictures. Only two of them are in frames—the others are mounted with our passe-partout outfits—we furnish everything but the glass; the cost of all these pictures was less than one dollar, and the total cost of the passe-partout materials, mounts and frames, even including the glass—was less than five dollars. Our catalog telling how to do it will be sent with five selected standard size pictures and two large ones, post-paid, for 25 cents if you will mention The Christian Herald. The catalog has a thousand miniature illustrations.

A Feast for Picture Lovers

Complete collections of Cosmos Pictures are in hundreds of the most refined and cultured homes in this country. The famous Cosmos Pictures have the very highest expression of real and lasting beauty; they please, satisfy and gratify the most cultured and refined tastes because they are the best and highest attainable examples of artistic reproductions of great masters, and can be had for a very small outlay of money.

Monday's Washing NO LONGER A DRUDGERY.

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer is the Greatest Time, Labor and Expense Saver Ever Invented.

No More Stooping, Boiling or Wearing Out of Clothes.

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer sent FREE!

without deposit or advance payment of any kind, freight paid, on 30 days trial. The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer is unquestionably the greatest labor-saving machine ever invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. There are no wheels, paddles, rockers, cranks or complicated machinery. It revolves on bicycle ball-bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required, a child can operate it. No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Hot water and soap all that is needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in 6 to 10 minutes.

The "1900" Washer will wash collars and cuffs, laces, cambrics and the most delicate materials perfectly clean and positively without tearing them or wearing out a single thread. It will wash blankets, bed spreads and the heaviest clothes just as easily and thoroughly. The washing is done while the operator sits by the side of the tub, revolving it by the handle.

ABSOLUTE PROOF.

$1.00 Worth of FREE Music

If there is a piano in your home we will send you without charge seven splendid musical compositions, two vocal and five instrumental. Three of these selections are copyrighted and cannot be bought in any music store for less than $1.00. With them we will send four portraits of great composers and four large reproductions of famous paintings of musical subjects.

Why We Make This Offer

We make this offer to reliable men and women to enable us to send information regarding our Library of the World's Best Music, which is absolutely the best collection of vocal and instrumental music ever published. It contains more music, more illustrations, and more biographies of composers than any other musical library. It is for general home use and enjoyment, as well as for students. Send your name and address, and ten cents in stamps to pay for postage and wrapping. When writing, kindly mention this periodical.

MOROCCO MISSIONARIES IN PERIL

DISQUIETING news comes from Morocco, to the effect that rebellion has broken out against the Sultan, and that the lives of the Christian missionaries at Fez, Mekinez, and possibly also those at Tangier, are in peril. It appears that the revolt, which is inspired by the influential element among the Sultan's subjects, who oppose reforms and the introduction of new methods in the country's affairs, has developed into an anti-foreign crusade. Sultan Mulai-abd-el-Aziz has become widely known as a ruler of progressive ideas. He has succeeded, by a liberal diplomacy, in bringing Morocco to the front, and in winning the good opinions of foreign nations. His attitude toward the foreign missionaries, too, has been tolerant, and he has personally favored their protection.

Messrs. Weiss and Curral, the American missionaries, who, with their wives and children, have been stationed at Tangier, the capital (and whose letters have frequently appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), have experienced from the Sultan's officials the most courteous treatment, and from the people in the capital many kindnesses. Near Tangier, however, there are Mohammedan factions or tribes in villages, who are bitterly anti-Christian, and among these the missionaries have labored at a disadvantage and at great personal risk. It is gathered from the dispatches, that the disaffected tribes have openly revolted against the Sultan, and announced their determination to dethrone him and place his brother, Mulai-Mohammed, in his stead. They want to rid the country of foreigners, and they also oppose the introduction of telephones, railroads and automobiles, as "devices of the Evil One," that are certain to accomplish the ruin of the nation!

Up to the present time, the active revolt is confined to the interior tribes, in the neighborhood of Fez and Mekinez, which are far from the coast. Rev. George C. Reed, an American missionary at Mekinez, writes that the whole country thereabouts is unsafe for foreigners. At present it is impossible for the missionaries to get away from Mekinez.

It is understood that the Berber tribes (who claim to be the original Hamitic descendants of the country) are the chief malcontents. Among these tribes are the Beni-Mtirs, Zimmurs and Geruans. Sultan Mulai's troops are poorly organized.

In a letter from missionary Weiss, which appeared in this journal on May 28, the rebellion among the interior tribes was fully discussed.

Bowery Mission Thanksgiving Day

Mrs. Sarah J. Bud, "Mother of the Bowery Boys," hopes their friends among THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will remember the homeless, lonely men and boys of the Bowery Mission, as last year. "Think," she says, "how it would be if you were in a great city alone, dinnerless, friendless, on Thanksgiving Day. Think what it would mean to you to have Christian friends take you by the hand, lead you into a warm, lighted room, and invite you, in Christ's name, to feast with them. Would it not make you feel their religion as something real and true?"

Father and mother, if your boy were here, alone, poor, roaming the street seeking work and finding it not, or perhaps, sinking into sin because none reached out loving hands to save; what would you have our mission do? Help us do by the wandering ones who are here, what you would have us do for your own. Our Thanksgiving dinner for homeless men and boys depends greatly upon your generous kindness, which has never failed, and we are sure you will make these wandering ones your guests, as well as ours, Thanksgiving Day, at the old Bowery Mission. Any sum will be welcome. Send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Pictures for Christmas

A LEADER AMONG WOMEN PASSED AWAY

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON

IN the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, which occurred in
New York City,
Sunday, Oct.
26th, the dean of the "Woman's Rights" movement passed away; and women's clubs
the world over pay tribute to her memory.
While many of her associates did not hold with her views on all questions
—that of the woman's Bible, for instance—

none could doubt her devotion to the cause of woman's advancement, as she understood it.
She was born November 12, 1815, in Johnstown, N. Y.; her mother was the daughter of Col. Livingston, of Washington's staff, her father was Justice Cady, of the New York Supreme Court. After the death of her only brother, Judge Cady said to his little girl: "I wish you might have been a boy." "I will be as much of a boy as I can," she thought, determining, as the first step in that direction, to study Greek and Latin and enter Union College. Announcing at Miss Willard's school her purpose to prepare herself for Union College, she was disgusted to learn that girls would not be received there, and decided then that some things in this world needed to be amended. Delving later into her father's law-books, she voiced this conclusion: "Laws are made for men only," and resolved to have some made for women. In 1840, as the bride of Henry Brewster Stanton, an ardent young Abolitionist, she went with him to the Anti-slavery Convention in London, to discover that women delegates were not allowed on the floor. In 1848, the world's first Woman's Rights Convention met at her call at Seneca Falls, N. Y., and the foundation was laid for the National Woman Suffrage Association, of which she was first president, then the honorary president. From 1840 to 1848, she had advocated the Married Woman's Property Rights Bill before the New York Legislature, until its passage was secured. The Loyal League of 1861-5, which ministered to soldiers and their families, was organized and led by her. Divorce laws, age of consent laws, child-labor laws, have all engaged her attention, but her chief effort has been to win the ballot for women, believing that only through its exercise could woman secure reforms desired.

"In the early days of our movement," says Susan B. Anthony, her life-long friend and co-worker, "she wrote every State paper and petition which we presented to Congress and the State Legislature." She was joint author, with Miss Anthony, of earlier volumes of the History of Woman Suffrage, later numbers of which have been completed by Miss Anthony and Mrs. Ida Husted Harper. Mrs.
Stanton was an eloquent lecturer. Her later years have been largely devoted to bringing women of all nations together, and to this end she founded, and served as its first president, the International Society of Women, under whose auspices a remarkable entertainment was given her on her eightieth birthday, when 3,000 clubwomen gathered around her to wish her joy. One of the latest acts of her life was to write a letter to Mrs. William King, President of the Georgia Woman's Press Club, extending her sympathy and encouragement to Southern women in their efforts to secure just child-labor laws. She was a handsome woman, and made an attractive picture in her old age, surrounded by her sons and daughters, all of whom were with her in her last hours.

Called Higher

"My mother, Mrs. S. M. Wheeler, spent her seventy-ninth birthday in heaven," writes Mrs.
William M. Avens, of Memphis, New York. "She had long been an invalid, suffering much, but murmuring not. Her Bible and her CHRISTIAN HER-ALD brought comfort to her sick and dying bed."

On a peaceful Sunday morning, in a pleasant country home near Bath, N. Y., a beloved wife and mother passed away with the death of Mrs. John Faulkner. For fourteen years she had been a weekly reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; and other members of its great "family circle" will sympathize with her bereaved ones because she has left them; and rejoice with them because she has gone to be with Jesus.

Mrs. C. S. Simington, Chicago, Ill., writes: "To my dear mother's friends in many States who are readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, this message of her departure to heaven is sent. Though nearly seventy-eight, she was bright and active and a great reader. The Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were always within her reach. The sermons were a special help to her, as she was deaf and could not hear the Gospel preached. She loved the Lord Jesus, and up to the last was blessing and praising him with every conscious moment. She has left a vacant chair in my home that can never be filled. I shall always love THE CHRISTIAN HERALD because mother loved it."

The makers of Magic Foot Drafts want the name and address of every one who has Rheumatism. "Send no money; we ask only for names.

Immediately upon receipt of your name a trial pair of drafts will be mailed to you.
If you are satisfied with the relief and comfort they give you send us One Dollar.

If not, don't send us a cent.

Magic Foot Drafts have brought more comfort into the State of Michigan than any internal remedy ever made. They have relieved thousands of the most unfortunate rheumatic sufferers in the world. They will brighten the rest of your life.

They are worn on the soles of the feet, without the least inconvenience, and act by drawing out and absorbing the poisonous acids in the blood. They also exercise a gentle counter-irritant effect, soothing and relieving the pain in every part of the body.

Magic Foot Drafts have a record in the city of Jackson, Michigan, where some very bad cases have been encountered, of relieving permanently nine out of ten cases.
The chances are nine out of ten that they will relieve you.

We have been sending these drafts everywhere on approval for many months.
Already they are in use in twelve countries outside of the United States.

Isn't it self-evident that our policy of sending on approval to everybody would be ruinous if Magic Foot Drafts didn't relieve Rheumatism?

Isn't it worth your while to try a pair, since it doesn't cost you anything? We want you to have them.

Send us your name to-day—we'll send the drafts by return mail, and will also send a valuable booklet about Rheumatism.

he had taken the young man's order, requesting that he should not pay him until Saturday evening and in his presence. When the time came, as Mr. Tate entered the door of the office, the gentleman handed over the money to the young fellow; whereupon Brother Tate stepped up and, holding the knife extended, he said: "Well, sir, here's your knife." There was no response. In louder tones he repeated, "Here's your knife." The young man looked at the money and then at the knife; he needed that money badly, but after carefully examining the knife, he handed over the price in settlement. Monday Mr. Tate was going around in the interests of his business, when he saw his young acquaintance of the week before seated on an empty beer keg, in front of a saloon. "Well, how is it with you, my friend?" he inquired. "Pretty thoroughly discouraged," was the response; "I can't get work to save me. How is it with you?" "Oh, grand, glorious, sunshine all along the way; how would you like to work for me? I'll pay you $1.50 a day to start on, but you will have to obey orders. I don't have kickers around me." "All right, sir, I'm willing to work for you; when do you want me to begin?" "Right away. Here, take this tract, go and hand it to that young man and tell him that Jesus loves him." The young fellow protested that he could never do that kind of business. "Why, are you not paid for doing it? Did you not promise to obey orders? Go and tell that young man that God loves his soul." After considerable delay the young man took the tract, and approaching the other, as he held out the tract for his acceptance, with a tremor in his voice, he said, "Here, read this. It will do you good. That gentleman over there is my boss, and he says that God loves you."

At present there are twenty-seven salesmen on the road, operating in the States of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Indiana, selling cutlery, fine horsehide razor-strops, and taking orders for printing done by the Mission.

The mission opened with three members. Five services are held on the Lord's Day and two during each week. The average attendance at the Bible School is seventy-five. The work is supported by an assessment of ten cents on each article sold. It is a busy hive of those who toil with their hands or labor with their brain. There are no loafers or drones around the work. They are firm believers in the Scriptural injunction that "if a man will not work neither shall he eat."

The work has grown so wondrously since it began, the 11th of December, 1901, that the present quarters are altogether too limited. The factory is running to its utmost capacity; a new and enlarged building is sorely needed.

The plans of the architect, Brother Tate, provides for co-operative stores, bakeries, meat-shops, a printing establishment, and a hotel, in every large city of the country, all conducted upon practical, Christian principles, and in connection with the Mission. No one owns any part of the property; everything is conducted upon the purest, simplest, and most Scriptural grounds.

Brother Tate is an active and honored "Gideon," and is in great demand in all of their services.

He is a man of enormous build, six feet tall, and two-thirds as broad, weighs 320 pounds, with tough limbs, plenty of good nature, and a stout heart.

He is a man to attract attention anywhere. Straight-haired, with an aquiline nose, and firm, full mouth, he slouches about town under a big soft felt hat with a four-inch brim, attired in a well-worn suit of gray, a little grip slung over one shoulder, and his pockets bulging with tracts and circulars for distribution. One might think that the men among whom he goes are not the ones to receive a traveling preacher with courtesy. But after all is said, this man Tate is not a man on whom his fellows look as do boys on the youngster who keeps his hair combed on Saturdays and tells his mother things. His hands look more fitted for the handling of revolvers than Bibles, and there is a pretty nerve in his eyes as he looks at one.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

Cost No More than Plain Ones in

White Bronze

Maple is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted citizens in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. While at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere.

White Bronze

Maple is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted citizens in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. While at once for free designs and information. THANKSGIVING*

Mercies, Though Unrecognized, An Incentive to Gratitude and Righteousness of Daily Life...

OUR present modes of thought have undoubtedly the tendency to make us forget the immanence of God. We have given so much attention to the universality of law that we have lost sight of the Divine rule and providence, which was so clear to our fathers. It is well, therefore, that our annual celebration should be observed, that it may remind us of the fact that God does control our lives, and that we are indebted to him for the blessings we enjoy. This fact is quite compatible with our recognition of the existence of law. Though we understand now that certain diseases are not indications of Divine displeasure, but are the direct result of bad sanitary conditions; we know that back of all law is the Creator, who assures us that his world is not governed by caprice, and that "the curse causeless shall not come." We see, even in our personal lives, how the prosperity that comes from energy, industry and enterprise, might easily have been missed, if God had not continued to bless us with reasoning faculties.

One of our popular journalists recently ridiculed the thanksgiving gift of a well-known millionaire, who, as a mark of gratitude for the deliverance of his family, when his home was burned, gave a large sum of money to a public institution. The journalist suggested that the gift implied the millionaire's idea that God caused the fire, and personally interfered to protect his family. But the reasoning was false. It was rational as well as devout, for the millionaire to realize that he was subject to the same risks of catastrophe that affect other men, and, knowing how easily the calamity might have been much worse, to have been thankful that he was spared the sorrow he might have had to bear. That he should have given practical expression to his thankfulness was a fit and proper recognition of the mercy. A man must be very blind to the significance of events in his own life, and in those of others, if he does not perceive that there is a guiding and controlling Hand which sets in motion, or restrains, the influences that shape our lives. Law is only God's way of working, and it should not undermine our reverence, or our sense of dependence on him, when we discover that there is a natural cause for experiences which were formerly attributed directly to God's interference. It is He who devised and established the law, and he still reserves to himself the control of its operation. Every prayer we offer is a recognition of this fact.

How, then, should we act, as we observe the mercies and kindnesses of which we are daily and hourly the recipients? Mere lip thankfulness is too cheap a return for this loving care. If, as the apostle says, the goodness of God leads to repentance, how much more should it lead to righteousness. All the discipline we undergo is a direct incentive to right living. It is God's purpose to bring us into line with the Divine order. Departing from it, is a direct provocation of punishment. When the punishment falls, we may be able to trace a natural cause for it, but none the less, it is admonition, and is intended as a life lesson. He leads a truly thankful life who tries to learn God's will and to govern his life in accordance with it. Trials frequently come which are hard to bear, and while we are under them there is little disposition for thankfulness; but even these trials may have a refining, purifying effect on the soul, which may be of infinitely greater value than is perceived at the time. The child is often unable to understand why he is required to study things which are not likely to be of any use to him in after life. It seems a useless and unnecessary labor. But when he enters life's arena, he discovers, perhaps, not the value of the thing he learned—he may have been quite right about its uselessness—but he finds that the quality of mind developed in its acquisition is of inestimable worth. So we are trained by trial for experiences that as yet we know nothing of.

SAPOLIO

A MODERN PETITION

O LORD, I come to thee in prayer once more;
But pardon that I do not kneel before
Thy gracious presence, for my knees are sore
With so much walking. In my chair, instead,
I'll sit at ease and humbly bow my head.

I've labored in Thy vineyard, Thou dost know;
I've sold ten tickets to the minstrel show;
I've called on fifteen strangers in our town,
Their contributions to our church put down;
I've baked a pot of beans for Wednesday's spree,

An old-time supper it is going to be;
I've dressed three dolls, too, for our annual fair,
And made a cake, which we must raffle there!

Now, with Thy boundless wisdom, so sublime,
Thou knowest that these duties all take time;
I have no time to fight my spirit's foes;
I have no time to mend my husband's clothes,
My children roam the streets from morn till night;

I have no time to teach them to do right;
But thou, O Lord, considering my cares,
Will count them righteous and heed my prayers.

Bless the Bean Supper and the Minstrel Show,
And put it in the hearts of all to go.
Induce all visitors to patronize
The men who in our programme advertise,
Because I've chased those merchants till they hid,

When'er they saw me coming—yes, they did!
Increase the contributions to our Fair,
And bless the people who assemble there.
Bless Thou the grab-bag and the gypsy tent,
The flower-table and the cake that's sent,
May our whist club be to Thy service blest,
The dancing party, gay and the rest;
And when Thou hast bestowed these blessings—then

We pray that Thou wilt bless our souls. Amen.

Sharon, Conn. MRS. JOHN B. SMITH.

Tribute to a Faithful Worker

AN eloquent testimonial was paid at the Eleventh Street M. E. Church, New York, October 29, by the "Mothers' Meeting" to Miss Sara Curry, well known to readers of this journal as founder and manager of the "Little Missionary's Day Nursery." The reception given her at the church was in recognition of her eight years' service as missionary of that congregation, from which position she is retiring—with no purpose, however, of laying down her work among the East Side poor, to whom she has greatly endeared herself. The meeting was composed largely of working women of slender means, but they brought their offerings, and the "Little Missionary" was almost hidden behind flowers. "Miss Curry," said one, "I present you this heart of love (the flowers were in that device) in behalf of the mothers. You have come into our homes and taught us how to live." A "basketful of love," a "horse-shoe of love" were other gifts. "Seven years ago," said one mother, President of the Helping Hand, "Miss Curry started our society with her own means, and opened her house and her pocket-book to us. She has taught us to help each other in trouble and sickness; and has shown us in her life what a Christian should be. Day or night she has never been too tired to come to us at our need." Mothers said: "Miss Curry brought the doctor to my baby." "She closed the eyes of mine." "She saved my baby's life." "She led me to Christ and into this church." A Hebrew leading her little ones said: "She showed me Jesus."

Rev. Mr. Henry and Rev. Mr. Fairchild, of neighboring Methodist Churches; Rev. Dr. Thomas; Mr. Miller, of the Mission Church Society, Brooklyn; Rev. Dr. Lee, who received Miss Curry into the church; Mr. Rolston, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Torrey, officers of "Little Missionary's Day Nursery"; the Secretary of the International Sunshine Society, and other prominent people were there to do her honor. In the absence of Rev. Mr. Fox, Pastor of Eleventh Street Church, Rev. Mr. Morehead, Assistant Pastor, spoke in recognition of her work, following the pastor's wife, who said if her husband were present he would voice his own appreciation.

The work at the Day Nursery has grown greatly since Miss Curry started it on a capital of large faith and little money. It has a house of its own and strong supporters; and as its manager, her hands are full to overflowing.

Gideons in Revival Work

The last Sunday in September the Gideons had four services in four of the Methodist Episcopal churches in Evanston, Ill. At the free Methodist service in the afternoon, fifteen adults expressed their determination to accept Christ; and at the after service, between fifty and sixty consecrated their all to God. It was a time of power and blessing.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET & BROWN'S BIBLE COMMENTARY

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow; Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York, and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen.

A complete commentary—critical, explanatory and practical—on the Old and New Testaments, 1840 pages, bound in cloth. Former Price, $7.50. The body of the work consists of notes that are concise, learned, free from verbiage and easily understood, that elucidate and explain difficult passages of Scripture, or whose import is not readily apprehended. Far in advance of the older works now in use, it is also the most practical, suggestive and scientific.

Rev. H. Clay Trumbull, Editor of the Sunday School Times: "I do not know of its equal, within its scope and cost."

Rev. J. H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "It deserves a place on the table of every Bible student."

CRITICAL AND EXPOSITORY BIBLE CYCLOPEDIA

Compiled and written by Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., joint author of the Jamieson, Fausset & Brown Bible Commentary. It contains 750 three-column pages; 600 illustrations. Regular Price, cloth binding, $5.00.

This great work is the result of seven years of labor by the author, contains three thousand seven hundred articles and presents a completeness, conciseness and thoroughness, such as to make it a perfect Bible Cyclopaedia. It sets forth briefly and suggestively those doctrinal and experimental truths which are contained in the Written Word itself.

J. W. Bashford, D.D., President Ohio Wesleyan University: "It is a most admirable aid. I hope ten thousand teachers will use it inside the next six months."

The late Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage: "It is in advance of all books in that line—unique, learned, accurate and valuable."

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

The celebrated Jewish Historian, translated from the Original Greek by William Whiston, A. M. Large Octavo Cloth, 1056 pages, nearly 100 illustrations. Former Price $4.00.

In this great work is contained the History and Antiquities of the Jews, Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; also Dissertations concerning Jesus Christ, John the Baptist, James the Just, and the Sacrifice of Isaac.

ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BIBLE

By Rev. John Kitto, D.D., F. S. A. It contains 735 double-column pages, 220 engravings, printed from excellent plates, on good paper, strongly bound in cloth. Former Price $4.50.

No modern writer has contributed more largely to enrich the biblical literature of our time, or to clothe with a fresh and living interest the main personages and incidents in Bible History than John Kitto in this magnificent work. Deeply interesting and instructive, and abounding in striking pictorial illustrations, it should have a place in every home. Over 100,000 copies of this popular work have been sold.

EDERSHEIM'S LIFE AND TIMES OF JESUS THE MESSIAH

(2 Vols.) The Authorized American Edition. By Alfred Edersheim, M. A., Oxon., D. D., Lecturer Oxford University.

Two Volumes. Former Price, $6.00. Royal 8vo, 1,524 pages, handsomely bound in silk cloth. Gives a full account of the society, life and development—intellectual and religious—in Palestine, to serve as a frame and background for the picture of Christ. The fresh study of the text of the Gospels makes the book a historical commentary on the Four Gospels.

The Sunday School Times recommends it: "It is positively refreshing to read a life of the Saviour which is critical in the best and truest sense of the word, and is biblical at the same time."

CONCISE CYCLOPEDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE

YOU CAN DO THE SAME THIS YEAR!

WHEN The Christian Herald printed our first advertisement, two years ago, few people realized the true value and significance of a New York real estate investment. It has been an educational process—and our customers are our best advertisers. Some, knowing us, had full confidence in our judgment and reliability; others simply took us at our word. We sold only half a million dollars' worth of property the first season; the second season, three and a half millions. To-day, thousands of people the country over have been here and thoroughly investigated our proposition and appreciate that it has no parallel in the world as a sterling, money-making opportunity—the

$10 SECURES A $510 LOT IN GREATER NEW YORK

It's a significant fact that 75 per cent. of our mail-order customers who finally visit New York increase their investment from 50 to 200 per cent. and return home with well-grounded enthusiasm, to interest others. Such a record as ours to-day is stronger evidence of the worth of our claims than pages of argument, illustration, statistics, and facts. All these we can give overwhelmingly, and will for the asking; but we point to the one best proof—results. Nothing could be more conclusive—the unbiased verdict of conservative thousands now well posted on the entire situation.

To keep in touch with the marvelous growth of New York at the present time, her tremendous building operations and almost incredible expansion, is to be convinced that her Brooklyn development must bring to the investor of to-day, within a very few years, thousands of dollars for his hundreds invested. The completion of the new bridges and tunnels now under way will make a mighty advance in Brooklyn's population and upbuilding, with corresponding increase of land values. All our properties lie in the sections first affected by this stimulus, and even now showing greatest activity. They are right on the edge of the "density belt," which is rapidly overtaking and surrounding us.

The phenomenal sale of Rugby, well known to The Christian Herald readers, a year ago, forces us to offer at once—a year earlier than intended—another property, in every sense the equal of Rugby, and what is more, it is the last large tract that we can ever hope to offer in Brooklyn, or that can possibly be advertised or sold at anything like present prices. We shall be restricted in future to scattered blocks and detached lots in various sections—all at much higher prices than we are asking for this remaining property.—"MARLBORO."

We Guarantee 25% Increase in 1 Year

For $10 down and $6 per month until paid for, we sell you a regular New York City lot, full size, subject to the following guarantees from us: If, at the expiration of the year 1903, this $510 lot is not worth $638—or 25 per cent increase—based on the price at which our corps of salesmen will then be selling similar lots, we will refund all the money you have paid us, with 6 per cent interest additional. If you should die at any time before payments have been completed, we will give to your heirs a deed of the lot without further cost. If you should lose employment or be sick, you will not forfeit the land.

case you buy we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away, we will pay a proportion equal to a round-trip Chicago ticket $36.

Marlboro occupies the corner of the 3rd ward nearest City Hall, and bounded by Gravesend Avenue, 60th Street, Bay Parkway (22d Avenue) and King's Highway, a half mile west of four of our other properties which have been such phenomenal successes. We are developing it with the same high class of park-like improvements, in exact accordance with city specifications, on 60, 80, and 100 foot streets, boulevarded with macadam, granolithic curbing, gutters and sidewalks, with flower-beds, trees and shrubbery, city water, etc. Transportation facilities are of superior character, and with the new transit, it will be within 20 minutes of City Hall.

Remember that our guarantee absolutely insures you an increase, or your money will be refunded. In fact, as these Marlboro lots are already selling fast, we hereby agree, in order to secure for you the earliest possible advantage of selection and an immediate share in the increase of values, to return to you—cheerfully and without quibbling—all the money you have paid us, if you are not perfectly satisfied, on examining our entire proposition within one year, that it is exactly as represented. MRS. CONGER'S RECEPTION—THE CHINESE PRINCESSES ARE SHAKING HANDS FOR THE FIRST TIME IN THEIR LIVES

American Ladies Entertain the Princesses of China

THE FIRST ACCOUNT OF A UNIQUE EVENT IN THE HISTORY OF THE CELESTIAL EMPIRE

BY CHARLOTTE BALDWIN FROST

NOT very long ago, an event occurred in Peking, China, entirely without precedent in the history of the world. Chinese ladies of the highest rank were entertained by foreigners. Such a thing had never before been dreamed of by even those most confident of "progress" in China.

CHARLOTTE BALDWIN FROST

The first step toward anything like a modern social function between the imperial family and the foreign legation ladies, took place in 1900, just before the siege of Peking. At that time the Empress Dowager astonished the world by giving an audience to the foreign diplomatic ladies in the capital. Mrs. Conger, wife of the American Minister, was the charming and tactful speaker for the foreign ladies on that occasion. The reception took place in the grand throne-room of the imperial palace, and the ladies with Mrs. Conger were the first foreign women who were ever asked to that wonderful room sacred to "The Son of Heaven."

After the terrors of the siege were over and the royal family had returned to the palace, Mrs. Conger decided to try what no one had ever tried before, to give a reception to the ladies of the Chinese royal family. She knew if she could accomplish this, a great stride would be made toward establishing friendly relations between the two nations, and toward dispelling the prejudices existing in the minds of the Chinese women concerning foreigners. Mr. Conger saw Prince Ching and other high officials, and suggested the idea. He was assured that the royal ladies would be delighted to receive such an invitation.

Through the kindness of one of the ladies present at that reception—probably the most exclusive social function of its kind in a century—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is able to give its readers the first authentic account of the memorable event. The ladies who assisted Mrs. Conger receive were Mrs. Drake, a friend visiting her at this time; Mrs. Bainbridge, wife of the Second Secretary of Legation; Mrs. Reeves, sister of the military attaché; Mrs. Brewster, wife of the Commander of the Legation Guard; her sister, Mrs. Kilbourne, and four well-known missionaries, Mrs. Gattrell, Dr. Leonard, Mrs. Lowry, and Miss Sheffield.

Upon these four missionaries depended the conversation of the afternoon, as they were the only ones of the number who spoke Chinese. All the gentlemen of the legation were rigidly banished for the afternoon. The streets of Peking, from the imperial palace to the gateway of the American legation, were lined with imperial Chinese troops—infantry and cavalry. At the legation itself, the American Legation Guard was on duty. In addition to this, Legation street, from the great moat to the end of the street, was guarded by a double line of Chinese police. No Chinese were allowed to walk on Legation street that afternoon.

A little before noon, the eleven Chinese ladies who were the guests of honor, assembled in the palace before the Empress Dowager, to receive her final instructions. Not one of these eleven women had ever set foot in a foreign house. Only four of them had ever seen a foreigner, those four having been present when the Empress gave her audience to the diplomatic ladies two years before. Having listened with deepest reverence to their mighty Empress, the princesses set out from the palace in their gorgeous sedan chairs. Their escort of chair-bearers, outriders, eunuchs and servants made a retinue of 461 persons! Minister Conger has good reason to know the exact number of retainers, for, chairs were of royal scarlet and contained six royal princesses. Princess Shun, sister of the Imperial Princess, the second and third wives of Prince Ching, and his third and fourth daughters, and the niece of the Empress. His sixth daughter, "the Little Princess" rode in a prince's red cart. Next came two beautiful green chairs, in which rode the two widowed princesses, for whom scarlet chairs would not have been proper. Little Miss Suang, the interpreter, rode in an official blue cart. When this gorgeous and wonderful cortege passed through the wide gate, over which floats the Stars and Stripes, it was indeed (to borrow a Chinese idiom) "je nao!" (very exciting.) The Princess Imperial remained in her chair until Mrs. Conger went out to greet and welcome her. Then they all left their chairs, and passed into the legation building together.

The American ladies had been much puzzled over their manner of greeting their guests, and had been practicing the Manchu form of salutation, but these bright little Chinese women had also been practicing, and relieved the situation by promptly shaking hands all round! They were a gorgeous sight as they trooped into the legation drawing-room. I shall try to describe their costumes to you. Being Manchu women, their feet were not bound, but of their natural size, and all of them wore beautifully embroidered satin shoes, in colors to match their robes. These shoes had high, white soles, four inches thick. Over these, graceful silk and satin robes fell to the floor. These robes were richly brocaded and embroidered, and of every color imaginable. Over the long robe each lady wore a shorter garment of some contrasting shade, reaching a little below the waist. The faces of all, except the two widowed princesses, were highly painted.

They wore a great deal of jewelry: heavy solid gold bracelets, set with magnificent whole pearls; beautiful rings, also set with pearls, pink amethyst, and rare jade; long ropes of pearl and other gems were on their necks, and they wore especially gorgeous earrings, many of which were fashioned in the form of the Imperial Dragon. But the headdresses were the most wonderful of all. A straight bar, perhaps three inches high, is worn straight across the top of the head. This bar is adorned with huge clusters of gaily nodding flowers, while from each end hang two long red tassels, reaching quite to the shoulders. From among the flowers peep wonderful gems, with here and there a according to Chinese custom, he, as host, had to tip every one of them.

In the first chair of imperial yellow, surmounted by a great gold knob, rode her Imperial Highness, the Princess Ta-Kung-Chu, wife of Prince Chu, and adopted daughter of the Empress Dowager, the woman, who, next to the Empress Dowager herself, has the most influence in the Empire. The next six

Heavenly Constrainers

LUKE 14: 23:

"Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in"

CHRIST was comparing the Kingdom of Heaven to a great banquet, which God had prepared for his invited guests, who would not come. The Earl of Leicester made great preparations to receive Elizabeth, the "Virgin Queen of England," when she visited the castle halls of old Kenilworth. But though the Queen lover made extraordinary and wonderful preparations to receive his royal guest in the gorgeous banquet hall of old Kenilworth, he made no such preparations as God had made in the parable to receive his heavenly guests, who would not come.

But, as the divinely invited guests would not come, then God practically said, "I will have my banquet hall filled notwithstanding. If the guests for whom the banquet was prepared will not come to me, then I will send out for those who will appreciate it. I will compel them to come in." So the Lord in the parable said to his servants—as Christ now says to us church members—"Go out into the highways and the hedges and compel them to come in." The purpose of this discourse is to show, how, as individual church members, we can become Heavenly Constrainers, and present the Gospel invitation to sinful men and women whom we meet in our daily walks of life.

Mr. Moody's Plan

When someone asked Mr. Moody: "How shall we reach the masses for Christ? How shall we give the Gospel invitation to those sinners who are out in the highways and the hedges?" he bluntly answered his questioner: "Go after them." But how are we to go after them? First, as Christ's disciples, we should begin our personal work among individuals by presenting the Gospel of Jesus to those who are closest to us. We should present Christ first to our fathers and mothers, to our husbands and wives, and brothers and sisters and children; to our dear friends, and to all who are bound to us by the ties of blood and love. We should do just the same as Andrew, the brother of Philip, did when he was converted. No sooner did he see the face of Christ, than he practically said to himself: "Why, I must immediately go and hunt up my dear brother Philip. How happy I can make him! We have been side by side in all our joys and sorrows, from the time we were born. He must share to-day in my new hope." It is upon this action of Andrew, who at once went and carried the Gospel invitation to his brother, that the great "Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip" has been established.

But though the eternal salvation of our unrepentant loved ones ought to be a perpetual cause of anxiety for us, day in and day out, yet there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of church members, who never think it obligatory for them to present the love of a living Christ to those who ought to be as dear to them as a Jonathan was to a David, a Damon to a Pythias, or the memory of a murdered King of Denmark was to an avenging son. These church members are ready to invite those friends to their homes, but they are not willing to personally invite them to sit at the holiest of all tables—the Table of the Blessed Communion. They are ready to talk with their friends upon politics or business, but they are not ready to discuss with them the greatest of all questions: "What shall it profit a man, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" They are ready to sound the praises of their friends to their other friends, but they are not ready to sound forth to their earthly friends the praises of their Heavenly Father. They are always ready to introduce one earthly friend to another, but they are not anxious to make their earthly companions acquainted with that Divine Companion who is ever willing to be our helper and guide along the troubled journey of life.

Invite the Strangers

But the Gospel invitation ought to be given to the strangers who are within a Christian's gates, as well as to the loved ones who have a right, by the ties of blood, to live there. It is nonsense for us to suppose that after we have gathered our fathers and mothers, and wives and husbands, and children, and a very few dear personal friends into the Gospel life-boat, we have a right to haul in the plank and cast off the hawsers and set sail for heaven, deeming our Christian responsibility fulfilled. No. Emphatically no. The Christian's obligations are so far-reaching towards his fellow-men that in the light of the Gospel, the poor traveler who was waylaid by thieves on the road to Jericho was just as much a brother to the good Samaritan, as if he had been born in the same cradle, sung to sleep by the same lullaby, and reared in the same homestead.

But though the Gospel teachings make the Jew and the Gentile brothers, yet the average church member does not feel that he has any direct responsibility in presenting the Gospel invitation to the stranger that is within his gates. After the minister has preached, some Sunday, a pertinent sermon upon this overwhelming text, "Go out into the highways and the hedges, and compel them to come in," this average church member accosts the pastor with words like the following: "Why, my dear pastor, you would not expect me to stand in the aisle of the church and ask the stranger to come into the after-meeting, would you? I am a young girl. It would not be proper for a young lady to speak to strange men and women, even in a church, without an introduction." Or some young man would say, "Preacher, I am a church member, but I cannot do what you want me to do. You surely would not expect me, when I am riding along in a railroad train, to talk about Christ with every man who might sit down by my side and open a conversation with me? Why, such a course as that would naturally be very embarrassing to me, as well as to the people with whom I talk." Yes, young man, or young woman, whether it be embarrassing or no; whether you have had an introduction or not to the people with whom you come into temporary contact, that is what I believe every true church member ought to do. I believe every Christian ought to be so anxious to save souls for Christ that, no matter in what position in life he may be placed, he ought never to allow any man, woman or child to come into contact with him in any way, unless he tactfully improves that chance for speaking a word for his Divine Master.

An Urgent Need

Church members should present the Gospel invitation to the men and women whom they chance to meet, the more willingly, because they would never dream of waiting for an introduction, or of hesitating on account of embarrassment, if they saw those same people threatened with any physical danger. Supposing, O Christian man, you were returning home late some night, and you saw the flames playing about the curtains of the dining-room in your neighbor's house. Would you hesitate for one instant about ringing that owner's doorbell because you had not a personal acquaintance with him? Would you first scurry round the town to hunt up some mutual acquaintance to give you that introduction? No! At the top of your lungs you would cry "Fire! Fire! Fire!" You would tell your companion, who was by your side, to run to the nearest fire-alarm box, and at once call the engines. If necessary, you would help carry the children down into the street in your protecting arms. After you are ready to do all that to warn a stranger of an earthly danger, do you mean to tell me that, unless you have been introduced, you have no right to give to that same stranger the Gospel invitation? I declare that your position is not tenable. I tell you that if you truly believe that an unrepentant sinner must die, then you should act towards the sinner who is in imminent danger of destruction, in the same way in which you would act towards that man who is sleeping in bed when the fire demons are dancing along his hallways and playing among the tapestries of his parlor.

Be Definite

Again, it is absolutely necessary, in order to carry out the command of my text, for the average church members to give the Gospel invitation to their friends and to strangers, when they are gathered inside the church walls as well as when they are scattered without. And it is also necessary for the church members to extend this invitation for a specified time and place. A general invitation to come to supper is, as a rule, worse than no invitation at all. So when the minister of the Lord Jesus Christ preaches a sermon, and gives a general invitation, and says to the sinners, "Come to Christ," and then dismisses his audience with a benediction, and goes home, as a rule, that sermon has amounted to but very little in its evangelistic results. But when the minister of the Lord Jesus Christ can go to his church members and say, "Brethren, we must gather in the sinners who are living around this church. We must go out into the highways and the hedges, and compel them to come in. We will to-night, as soon as the benediction has been pronounced, have an after-meeting. As members of this church, we will distribute ourselves through the aisles and buttonhole every man, woman and child, so that no one shall leave the building without having a special invitation for this after-meeting," there will be no disappointment in the spiritual results. Why? Because the church members themselves are asking their friends and the strangers to meet Jesus Christ in a specified place, at a specified time. General invitations, in reference to the Gospel banquet, as well as to an earthly home, are as useless as no invitations at all.

So, to-day, I lay the blame for the lack of spiritual results in our churches far more upon the pews than I do upon the pulpits. God knows, I do not believe that our ministers are perfect men, but most of them are earnest men, intense men. They would do anything in their power to bring immortal souls to Christ. But the trouble is when the average minister of the Gospel announces an after-meeting where sinners can be brought face to face with Christ, nine-tenths, aye, ninety-nine hundredths of all the church members, will get up and put on their hats and go home. They will not only by their actions refuse to personally extend an invitation to the men and women who are sitting by their side, but they will absolutely refuse to go into the after-meeting and talk with sinners who are Trying to Find Christ

This charge which I make against the church members I make not only against the laymen, but also against the church officers. I make it against the elders, the deacons, and the trustees. I make it in the strength of the overwhelming fact that you derelict church members cannot find a great evangelistic preacher who is accomplishing any great good for Christ, who is not backed up by a praying, consecrated band of earnest church workers. Yet you can find to-day, church after church in our land, that are nothing more or less than slaughter-houses for ministerial usefulness. Their pastors will win great spiritual successes before they come to them; and those pastors will win great spiritual successes after they leave them; but while they are in those spiritually dead churches, the pastors will stumble about blinded and helpless, as did the mighty Samson bound with fetters of brass, with his two eyes out, grinding about in the prison-house of Gaza. Those evangelistic ministers are spiritually helpless in such churches because the people, the common church members, will not unite as a working force and personally present the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the strangers who come among them. Instead of deriding and underestimating the power of the ministry, it is high time for some one to thunder a philippic against the indifference of the selfish church members who refuse to spiritually support the pulpit, as the pew always ought loyally to do.

The Gospel invitation should be presented by the church members to their friends and to the strangers wherever they may be found, because the vast majority of sinners never enter the church at all. Therefore, if they do not have Christ presented to them on the street in the office, in the railroad trains, and even in the kitchen, they will never be invited at all. Mr. Beecher once powerfully said, "The longer I live, the more confidence I have in those sermons preached, where one man is a minister, and where there is no question as to who is meant, when the preacher says, 'Thou art the man!'" I believe Mr. Beecher was right when he made that statement. But I believe he was right, even in a larger sense. The longer I live, the more confidence I have in those sermons that are thus preached, because such a Gospel service can be held everywhere. It can use the mechanic's bench for a pulpit. It can have the iceman's cart for a moving tabernacle. It can carry the "Bread of Life" to the sinner who would otherwise never be willing to receive that Bread over the pulpit desk. Besides, the minister in such a case does not have to be an ordained theological student, but need be simply an earnest consecrated layman, pleading for Christ, with the sinner who is standing by his side in the village store. If all church members were to become earnest and consecrated evangelists, it would not take very long for this whole sinful world to see the sunrise burst of the millennial dawn. Surely it would not be too much to expect that one such evangelist as Mr. Beecher described should at least win one soul a year for Christ. Yet, Dr. William Morley Punshon, the great English Methodist, once made the startling statement: "If every disciple to-day were to call only one person to Christ each year, and that one were to call one other, how swiftly the world would be wholly converted. There are to-day millions of true believers in the world. But if there were only one hundred, see how quickly the work would grow. In less than twenty-five years the world would be converted, for this would double the number of disciples each year." After such an impressive statement, will any one say that the Gospel invitation, which can be given daily by the church members, would amount to but little in the salvation of a sinful world?

The Brutal Murder of Missionary Cooper at Fez, and the Sultan's Quick Vengeance on the Assassin

Special Correspondence of The Christian Herald
TANGIER, Morocco, Oct. 21.

ENCLOSE a picture of Mr. Cooper, a missionary of the North African Mission, who was shot in the city of Fez, by a fanatical Moor, four days ago. Mr. Cooper left Tangier with his wife and two children about three weeks ago, having spent the summer months here, resting. It was here in Tangier that we first met Mr. and Mrs. Cooper. They were truly a blessing to Morocco, and were greatly beloved by all who knew them.

Mr. Cooper's talks to us were heart stirring, and especially his last talk before leaving Tangier for Fez. When the news came of his death, our girls wept as though their hearts would break. He was much loved by the children. He had labored six years as a missionary in this land. He had arrived in Fez only four days before this sad event. On that day, he and two native colporteurs went to the market-place to buy some matting for the floor of their new Mission home. While they were purchasing the articles, out rushed a fanatic Moor from Manli Adree's mosque. Instantly pulling a revolver from underneath his gelab (coat), he shot Mr. Cooper in the abdomen. The latter fell, but was quickly picked up by four men and carried to the mission house. Medical help was summoned—a doctor and a dentist—but after two hours of great agony, the devoted missionary passed peacefully away.

After the assassination, the fanatic ran back to the mosque for refuge. This mosque is considered by the Mohammedans a very holy place. Murderers, thieves and all sorts of criminals go there to find sanctuary, and no one can touch them while there. When this case was told to the Sultan, he immediately sent his soldiers to the mosque and brought forth the murderer, something never known to have been done before. Then he ordered him to be placed upon a horse and taken through all the streets of the city, to make him an example to the people. After this was done, the murderer was shot dead by the Sultan's soldiers.

It was a great shock to Mrs. Cooper, who is now bereft of her husband, and left with two little ones, one a babe of six months. She is a very devoted Christian. We all sympathize with her.

We have been informed later that all the Christian workers in Fez had been ordered to leave at once, as the more fanatical portion of the natives are in a great state of tumult, and are stirred up by the Sultan showing protection to the foreigners and causing the murderer to be brought from the mosque and publicly killed as a punishment for doing just what they claim to be their religious duty to do. Dear readers of THE CHRISTIAN

HERALD, pray for the missionaries here, and that thousands of souls may be brought from darkness into light and from the power of Satan unto God through the sacrifice of the life of this departed brother. We thank God for the interest many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have taken in our work. One has vouched for the support of a native helper, others have sent of their means for our support and to help the Gospel work among the people of this dark land.

Our work among the villages around Tangier for the extension of Christ's kingdom, daily becomes more interesting. It has its many hindrances in a land of this kind, but its many encouraging features must not be overlooked. Soon after daybreak, we mount our horses at our mission home: our pockets are filled with Bible portions. Hardly are we well started on the road when we meet a group of children, who reach up their hands and at the same time ask for a gift. They are delighted when they see us putting our hands into our pockets, and bringing forth the few coins they so much desire. We journey a little farther, and meet a camel caravan coming into Tangier. They have been many days on the road and are heavy laden. They look tired. We stop the men and open up a conversation. We talk to them about Christ our Saviour.

Once again we are on our way. Soon our attention is drawn to a well by the roadside, around which a number of persons are standing while others are drawing water. Some are engaged in filling little barrels with water; these they take to the town on donkeys and deliver to the people. We go close to the well; all eyes are upon us. We have an interested audience, as we tell them the Gospel message.

Again we travel onwards. We cannot help but notice the women, who pass us with huge bundles of grass and wood, staggering at times under the load. The poor, oppressed women of Morocco, may God soon come with a great deliverance for these who are now so downtrodden by the men! Soon we reach the lane which leads up to the village, which is our destination. As we go up the lane and come close to the grass huts, we run a gauntlet with several yelping dogs. These are driven back by the children, who come out to meet us.

The village consists of about one hundred huts closely built together. The people come crawling out of these hovels on their hands and knees through the little doors. We use various means to win their interest, so that they will listen to what we have to say. We give pieces of cloth, one yard in length, to the children. This generally brings out the mothers. The men are slow in coming near us. In the end, however, we gain their attention, and read to them a portion of Scripture. It becomes interesting, and they now begin to ask many questions, which we endeavor to answer with cheerfulness. A few Scripture portions are left; we shake hands all round, and are off for the next village.

As we go from village to village, we pass through the wheat fields that have just been harvested. In the fields we see women threshing wheat. We speak a few words to them. They are sitting upon the ground. The sheaves lay close at hand; they are small. The women take a sheaf in one hand, and with a heavy stick in the other, they beat the heads of the wheat; thus, by beating, the grain falls to the ground. We enter into a conversation with these women, and as we speak to them about Christ our Saviour, they at once begin to contend for Mohammed, their prophet, and we in a pleasant manner continue to preach Christ to them. With glad hearts we leave them, praying that he who gave the word to speak this day will let it spring forth as seed planted in good ground. Thus we have sown beside all waters, knowing that as true as there is a seed time, there will also be a harvest, even in this dark land of Morocco. We trust that we shall have your continued prayers, and also those of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, that there may be a bountiful harvest and ingathering of many souls.

CALLED HIGHER

"Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in its season," was the text from which the funeral sermon of Thomas Parkinson, of Moreno, Calif., was preached. The day before his death, he drove over twenty miles to celebrate his ninety-fifth birthday. For forty years he was an active church member. His wife, Margaret, preceded him seven years ago. Thirteen children were born to them, twelve of whom reached maturity.

For over forty years, James Fort King, as elder of the Presbyterian Church, Waynesville, Ga., was an active and faithful laborer in the Master's vineyard. Sabbath day found him driving, rain or shine, to his church, nine miles from home. If no minister was present, he read a sermon or preached one he himself prepared; when the weather would be so unfavorable that few else would go out, he was in his place, even though he had to speak his words of grace and counsel to nearly empty benches. His summons came suddenly when he was seventy-eight years old; but his "lamp was trimmed and burning," and he was glad to go home.

"As a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family," writes a friend, "I inform you of the death of two of your faithful readers of Hunterstown, Pa., Mrs. Elizabeth Yeatts, who passed away calmly and peacefully in the eighty-second year of her age, and her son, William, who, in less than a month, followed her to the 'Better Land.' He was fifty-four years old. For a long period he had been a faithful member of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, and an active member of the Luther League, and for many years he was superintendent of the Sabbath School."

Mrs. J. A. Phelps, Maple Park, Ill., writes: "I wish to inform you of the death of one of your subscribers, who was over ninety years of age, and who had been a faithful Christian from the age of eighteen until the day of her death. She had taken your paper for a long time, and always watched eagerly for its coming. Her especial delight was the sermon, which she generally left for Sunday afternoon reading in connection with her Bible. She died secure in the faith that glorified her whole life; her last words were full of praise for her Saviour."

Stories for Happy Evenings

Do you want a book of stories which will interest and help the children, the young folks and the old folks? GO TO THE LIGHT light the lamp on the evening table, and then let older ones read aloud by turns, while other adults ply their fancywork or fold busy hands for a good resting-spell, and dear little folks just listen, their sweet, earnest faces uplifted to the reader in eager and grateful attention. It costs only $2 to have all this first-class entertainment at your command, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—the best family weekly in the world—for a whole year.

The Victories of the Few

GIDEON AND THE THREE HUNDRED

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 30
JUDGES 7: 1-8

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"IT IS BETTER TO TRUST IN THE LORD THAN TO PUT CONFIDENCE IN MEN." PSALM 118: 8

The Lesson Story

IT is interesting to visit places where distinguished generals have received their commissions, such as the Brad-dock House, where Washington was given his commission as Commander in Chief of the American army, in the war of the Revolution. Such interest takes us to Ophrah, near the ancient Shechem. We are almost within the shadows of those historic mountains, Ebal and Gerizim, whose towering heights are so closely woven with Israel's history. We have come to visit the spot where Gideon received his commission from the Lord God himself. He was to be the leader of Israel's forces against the invading host of Midian, a foe so numerous and so destructive, that they were compared with a grasshoppers' plague (Judges 6: 5). They were indeed a "plague," for they had again and again pillaged the plain of Esdraelon, the granary of Palestine, leaving the Israelites neither crops nor herds; they hardly escaped with their lives. Many of them fled to the mountains, and were living in dens and caves. Then it was they cried to God for help.

BE BRAVE AND UNSELFISH

Gideon was not dreaming of mighty deeds, but hiding behind a rock that he might not be discovered by the Midianites, while he threshed out a little wheat to keep himself and family from starving. We would not think him a very promising leader, but God knows what is in a man. An angel from heaven was sent to bear his commission, indeed, it was the Jehovah angel, Jesus himself, who said: "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." It was like advance pay, for praise was given Gideon more for what he should do, than for what he had done. And when it was told him, "Thou shalt save Israel from the hands of the Midianites," he was further assured, "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man." We see stains upon the rock. The stone is blackened as by fire. Evidently a sacrifice has been burned upon it. We seem to see Gideon bringing his "present" of cakes and meat and broth. It is indeed the peace offering, which a man may bring to God as a token of friendship. And as such the Lord receives it, causing fire to come out of the rock, and burn it up.

And now Gideon goes forth to summon with trumpets the forces he is to lead; and they gather to the number of thirty-two thousand. Is Gideon proud of his army? Does he think they are all men of valor? They are about to be tested. The Lord has no need of the selfish nor of cowards. And both of these kinds are in Gideon's army. All who wish to do so are given opportunity to lay down their arms and go home. Twenty-two thousand do so. A small remnant of ten thousand is left. Are they all pure gold? No; the Lord sees some among them who put self above patriotism, and these must be weeded out. They are tested with water when they are thirsty. They are close upon the foe, but as they stop to drink at a pond, most of them throw themselves upon the ground, caring only to gratify their thirst. Three hundred only show self-control, and stoop only a little, to throw the water to their mouths with a rotary motion, their eyes ever on the foe. These are the warriors whom God can use. The other nine thousand seven hundred are left in camp, as pursuers when the battle is won.

God chooses the weapons of the three hundred for them. Each man is to bear not a sword, but a lamp, a pitcher and a trumpet. With these "weapons" in their hands, Gideon is told to bring them close to the camp of the Midianites under cover of night. They come, and find their enemy fast asleep in their tents. What matters it to them that their foe is 450 to 1? Their God is fighting for them. He has promised them victory. Gideon has given them the signal: "When I blow with a trumpet, then blow ye." And they blow, and cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Their own swords are not in evidence. The battle is the Lord's. The Midianites are rudely aroused by the trumpets. They believe that a host more than twice the number of their own is upon them, for each trumpeter is supposed to represent at least one thousand men. They are bewildered by the flash of torches in the hands of Gideon's men, and flee in dismay. Gideon summons all his forces to complete the rout, those who had been left in camp and the twenty-two thousand who had gone to their homes. "Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more, and the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon" (Judges 8: 28).

Illustration and Application

In pruning, we see a case parallel to Gideon's strengthening by subtraction. When the vinedresser, with his great shears, cuts off branch after branch until there seems to be nothing left but a stump, it looks like destruction, but in lessening the leaves and branches he is increasing the fruitfulness of the vine. Many a church would be stronger if the membership list were pruned instead of padded. We are usually too anxious for quantity and not particular enough about quality. It is now too hard to get the unworthy out of the church and too easy for them to get in with their contagious cowardice and selfishness, that make their room better than their company. Some such tests as Gideon's should precede full rank in God's army. Let cowards and the selfish stay "on probation" and in the "endeavor" vestibule till they prove themselves Christians by courage and self-denial, or at least self-control.

And how nature, in many a battle of its forces, shows the power of gentle influences! The iceberg in all its terror is conquered by the sunlight. And how the great cliffs bear the "water test," as if reminding us how fear and selfishness and sorrow should beat against us in vain!

Many a large man would be physically stronger if healthfully relieved of his dead flesh and "proud flesh," and so many a church would increase its influence if its membership was lessened in quantity to improve its quality. Not that we advocate expulsion except in extreme cases, but let us guard the gate against those who have not learned of Christ courage and unselfishness.

Over and over, the Bible exhibits "the might of right" in battles where a few with God prove more than a match for numerous foes. Abraham had only eighteen more than Gideon's three hundred when he defeated the mighty general, Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14: 14-24). And how free from selfish-strength of sceptics from Renan down to Ingersoll does not inspire such misgivings for Christianity as are awakened by delinquent Christians in bad weather." Let those who have been thrilled by Gideon's band with aspirations to do likewise, not wait for lamps, pitchers and trumpets, but on the first stormy Sunday arm themselves with umbrellas, rubbers and waterproofs, and march to the firing line with the faithful few. But let there be no censorious comments on the empty seats. A scholar who found herself alone in the class with her teacher, one day, began to complain of the absence of the other scholars. "Just look at these empty benches," said she. "I do not see empty benches." "Not see empty benches! Oh Miss—!" "No," repeated the teacher, gently, "the seats are all filled, to me; filled with the presence of Christ! My scholars may disappoint me, but there is One who never fails to be here. I have been teaching for ten years, and Jesus has never once been absent." God himself filled the vacated places in Gideon's ranks from which the cowardly and selfish had retreated. Every trumpet meant a regiment, of which nine hundred and ninety-nine were God's invisible host, that always fight with the faithful few. What a beautiful Christian weapon was the lamp that each of Gideon's soldiers carried, hidden in a pitcher till the hour he bade them smash the pitchers and let their light shine for the overthrow of evil forces! But we must carry our lamp of Christian life and testimony carefully in a wicked world, as we are reminded illustratively by the explosion, in 1899, in the Cambria coal mine at Johnstown, Pa., in which one hundred and twenty miners perished. The reason stood revealed when several dead Slavs were found with "naked lamps," and paid the penalty, dying in the explosion of the gas, known as fire-damp, ignited by their own lamps. Our own eternal life and that of others may be destroyed by trifling with the lamp of our Christian influence by going, for example, where others cannot safely follow us, in selfish indulgence—the very sin that thinned Gideon's army the second time. The self-indulgence most to be feared to-day drinks something stronger than water.

There is yet another pertinent lamp illustration on the positive side of courage, which was Gideon's first testing point. The safety lamp for mines had just been invented, and the inventor, George Stephenson, himself a colliery fireman, declared he was going down into parts of the mine where the fire-damp was thickest to test it. His comrades tried by every argument but force to keep him from the perilous test. "He will blow the mine and himself to pieces," they said. But he had the courage of his convictions and made the test, and has saved thousands from that peril, one of a multitude of the victories of peace no less renowned than war. The qualities shown by Gideon's three hundred in their unselfish mastery of self was seen also in an Indian boy, who died in the Hampton School, and left some few effects, among which was found a paper containing these words: "My reasons for coming to Hampton: To develop all my powers; to learn self-control; to help my people."

No doubt one reason why the Midianites were defeated was that they had undue self-confidence, because of their superior numbers. It is when we are most self-confident that we are most in peril, because in such moods we cease to rely on God. Far away in the northwest part of India is a town called Gwalior, famous for its strong castle. About a hundred years ago this stronghold belonged to a great Indian chief, called Sindia. It was built so high up, and was so steep all round, that the people of India thought it was impregnable, and so there was only a small garrison left there to take care of it. But in the British Army there was an officer, of the name of Major Popham, who did not think it was an impossibility to capture it. So for two months he loitered round about, making up his plans, for what everybody else thought an "act of madness," but what he called his "glorious object." At the end of that time, on the night of August 3, 1780, twenty English soldiers, under Captain Bruce, and two companies of Sepoys with four officers, by the help of scaling ladders, climbed up the almost perpendicular heights, and took the bewildered garrison so completely by surprise that the fort was captured.

What caused the downfall? Was it not because those who were in the stronghold were at ease, too self-confident? In all history there is hardly a nobler parallel to the Gideon story than Gustavus Adolphus' Battle Song, with which his Protestant forces marched to victory against their more numerous Roman Catholic foes in the Reformation period:

Fear not, O little flock! the foe who madly seeks your overthrow;
Dread not his rage and power!
What though your courage sometimes faints, his seeming triumph
O'er God's saints,
Lasts but one little hour.
Amen, Lord Jesus, grant our prayer: Great Captain now thine arm
Make bare,—
Fight for us once again;
So shall thy saints and martyrs raise a mighty chorus to thy praise, World without end—Amen.

"THE THREE COMPANIES BLEW THE TRUMPETS, AND BRAKE THE PITCHERS, AND HELD THE LAMPS"

ness, as well as fear, were Abraham and his little army! Abraham was entitled to the lion's share of the booty captured, but refused to take any of it, giving a tithe to God's priest, and the remainder to his allies, Aner, Eshcol and Mamre. As the overthrow of the Midianites was the act of God, Gideon's army using sound and light, but no sword, so the defeat of the great army of Egypt that pursued Israel (Exod. 14: 13-28), and of the Syrians, who besieged Samaria (II. Kings 7: 6, 7), and of Sennacherib (Isa. 37: 36) was wrought by God's invisible army of the air that ever "encampeth about them that fear him." Not of Sennacherib's host only, but of all these cases, Byron's words are true:

Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen;
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn has blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strewn.

The might of the Gentile unsmote by the sword,
Hath melted like snow at the glance of the Lord.

Gideon's victory also recalls the case where God's army seemed like "two little flocks of kids" to the wolf pack that attacked them; but God and the kids came out victors (II. Kings 20: 27). By these and many more such victories and defeats, God seeks to teach us that our strength is not in numbers, but in our Divine ally.

On rainy Sundays and rainy election days, God's army of to-day is thinned by the water test very much as in Gideon's day. Dr. C. H. Parkhurst reminds us that a wet election day always affects the vote, because there is a class which has less dread of defeat than of getting its feet wet. And Dr. Cuyler says that "all the

THE MOTHER

By IRVING BACHELLER

Author of "Eben Holden," etc.

WE were moving at a snail's pace on a way train. It was growing dark, and the brakeman was lighting the lamps. A great loneliness fell on us as we sat looking out of a window on the gloomy plains of middle Kansas. A beardless youth and his young bride, just leaving home for a long journey, sat opposite. Their eyes were wet with tears, and we looked at them and remembered a far day, and were silent. A woman, holding a baby, was humming an old cradle-song in a low, monotonous tone full of love and sorrow. A drummer, just ahead, sat sighing behind a barricade of grips and bundles. It was easy to get the drift of that silence among the wayfarers—they were all thinking of home.

Suddenly a gentle voice broke the silence, and we all turned in our seats.

"Have we crossed the Missouri river yet?"

Looking back, we saw an old lady sitting alone. She spoke in a sweet mother-tone that thrilled us. My wife and I went back to her seat.

"I was wonderin'," she said, leaning forward timidly, "if we've crossed the Missouri river yet."

She sat beside an old-fashioned, shabby satchel of glazed cloth. Her form was bent, her face wrinkled, her hands hardened with toil. She wore an old shawl, now threadbare, and a bonnet bought some distant, better day. But there was something in her voice and smile that might have made us beg her blessing on our bended knees. There is so much in a voice; I almost think that God will judge the quick and the dead by their voices. Her voice came out of a soul seasoned by sorrows, and white. At the altar, at the cradle, at the farewell on the threshold, at the bedside of the sick, at the graves of the dead, it had got its quality.

"Goin' t' live with my darter over 'n Missouri," she said. "I'll hev t' change cars at Saint Jo. We ain't got there yet, hev we?"

"No," I said, as we sat down facing her. "We don't arrive there until late this evening."

"Ain't seen my darter fer years an' years," she went on. "She's my only gal, an' the boys is all gone 'cept one. Jes' tuk him t' the 'sylum. Has fits, an' I guess he won't never work no more."

"Is your husband living?" I inquired.

"No, sir; my man died fourteen year ago. Home's all broke up. Ain't gittin' near Saint Jo, be we? she repeated, looking anxiously through the window as we were crossing a bridge. "Oh, I guess that's the Missouri river now."

She chatted away in that cheerful manner awhile. Suddenly the train began to slow up; the car quivered as the brakes took hold; the lamps began to rattle, and then—we were standing still on the broad, dusky plain. The rear door opened with a brisk turn of the knob. My wife nudged me and I looked up. A man was advancing, a mask over his eyes.

He had a long revolver in his right hand. "Put up yer han's—every one o' you!" he shouted.

All hands went up, except those of the old lady. The revolver's muzzle was uncomfortably near as the robber halted. I knew death was ready to leap out of that little, round hole. I thought of resisting, but my hand was creeping into my pocket.

"The collection'll now be taken up," he coldly an-

"Yer watch, too," he added, savagely, and I gave it to him.

Without a word, the old lady passed him a faded handkerchief in which her money was tied. He would have passed on, but he saw her trembling hands were groping under her shawl.

"Hate t' let ye hev this watch," she said, as she offered it. "Oldest boy giv it to me years 'n' years ago—one Crissmus time. It's pure gold."

Her voice trembled as she spoke of this treasure, and she gave an odd emphasis to the "pure gold."

Why don't the man take it, I wondered. He stood, looking down the car, as if he were not hearing. Then he glanced hurriedly at the little old woman, dropped everything but the revolver, and stepped quickly backwards out of the open door.

"Scart, I guess," said the old lady smiling, after we had got our breaths. Then the trainmen came running through the car, and the woman with the baby sobbed in a fit of hysterics. It was half an hour before the excitement had abated and the train began moving. Presently the drummer came down the aisle and beckoned to me.

"Held up his own mother," he whispered, as we went aside.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Plain as day," said he. "He'd given her the watch himself an' recognized it. That's why he quit."

"Hush!" I said. "Don't say a word to anyone. She might hear of it."

At St. Jo we helped her off the car and into the depot.

"She'll have to stay here twenty-three hours before she can get to Shanleyville," said the doorkeeper.

"Don't mind waitin'," she said, in the same cheerful, kindly voice. "I'll set down here, an' I won't mind it none. Got so much to think about, time'll pass quick. I couldn't sleep—mercy, no—never can sleep if I'm goin' away anywheres."

We urged her to go with us for the night, but she refused. So I got a rocking-chair and made her as comfortable as she would let me, in the ladies' room.

Late at night I went down to the depot to look after her. It was cold and silent and deserted. I pushed the door open cautiously and peered into the ladies' room. There she sat, all alone, rocking, and as she rocked, she sang, in a low, sweet voice:

There'll be no more sorrow there;
There'll be no more sorrow there;
In heaven above, where all is love,
There'll be no more sorrow there.

Then I saw that she was holding her satchel against her breast, and patting it as if it were a baby. "Hush," she said, when she had finished singing. "Don't cry, poor little boy! Don't cry! Don't cry! Hush-h!" "Oh, Sairey," she continued, in a trembling, choky voice, and wiping her eyes, "ye hadn't orter talk t' me like that. It makes me feel so bad. Ye hadn't orter, Sairey."

Then some noise seemed to startle her, and I came away.

Fame's Temple

Who are the most illustrious men and women that America has produced? When did they live, what did they accomplish, what is their influence on the world to-day? The answer to these absorbing questions, so full of importance and of inspiration, is to be found in Dr. Albert Louis Banks' stirring book, The Illustrated Story of the Hall of Fame, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD now offers to its readers. When the magnificent Hall of Fame was erected on the banks of the Hudson River, the names of twenty-nine great Americans were elected as the first to be commemorated there. It is the lives of these men, who stand as the models of American manhood, as the inspiration for all great purposes and noble endeavor, that Dr. Banks has retold with a vital power that kindles the enthusiasm of the reader, that extracts from the pages of history the absorbing interest of a romance. He relates, too, the careers of other great men who were nominated by the public for this singular honor, and of these great American women who have been deemed worthy to have their names immortalized in the Temple of Fame.

The book contains the complete story of the inception and erection of the splendid building, of the manner in which the Immortals were elected, and an account of the impressive dedication services. It is magnificently illustrated with over one hundred portraits and pictures, printed in two colors. There should be a place for it, not only on the table of every American home, but in the hearts of the people. It stands for patriotism.

Life, Love and Achievement

We all love a good story. There are 301 complete stories in Dr. Iglehart's new book, which is now offered to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and which is entitled The Speaking Oak, and Three Hundred other Tales of Life, Love and Achievement. There are stories of adventure, stories of heroism, stories of devotion, stories of land and sea, stories of mythological characters, stories of modern men and women. The Speaking Oak is something more than a mere story book. Dr. Iglehart is not only famous for his anecdotes but for his teachings, and in a few inspiring words he points out the lesson which every story imparts. He has prepared, moreover, an index so that the reader can see at a glance what texts in the Bible are illustrated by the stories. Among the anecdotes are many that have never before been told, of Abraham Lincoln, Washington Irving, and other national heroes. The book is, in fact, a library of anecdote. It will amuse, it will instruct, it will inspire—above all, it will encourage people to think.

The Bible in the Schools of India

AS a contrast to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Nebraska, excluding the Bible from the public Schools of that State, it is interesting to note that some of the leading native reformers in India are earnestly advocating the introduction of the Bible as a class book in all Primary and High Schools. They point out that Western civilization cannot be rightly understood, without a knowledge of the Book which has played so prominent a part in its development. The penetration which this remark indicates, is significant. We can imagine the Hindoo asking himself how it is that so small a nation should be able to rule that teeming country, and in what the superiority of the white man consists. He does not lay his finger on the knowledge of the arts and sciences, which is so conspicuous in the white man's civilization. He goes deeper, and discovers that it consists in the moral fibre of character. The white man is a stronger, more self-reliant, energetic man than the native, and, seeking to know why he is so, he discovers that the source of character is in the Bible. Probably he does not yet appreciate the religion of the Bible, but he perceives that the effect of the study of the Book is to develop character. It makes a young man more helpful, honest, reliable and a better citizen. It stimulates his mind, sets him thinking, and makes him more intelligent. So he advocates the study of the Bible in the schools, that the children may become better men than their fathers.

It is a singular fact, that news of this movement should have come just at the time when one of our States has decided to dispense with the help of the Bible in education. It cannot be possible that the qualities that the Hindoo admires, and wishes his children to attain, are not appreciated in Nebraska. The Nebraska educators, as well as he, must be aware that mere knowledge is not education; that it is more necessary that the child should be trained to make a good use of his knowledge, than that he should gain knowledge. That principle all will accept. How, then, can it be attained? These reforming Hindoos believe that it can best be gained from the Bible; and if they knew more of our history and of the struggles which have been fought and the victories that have been won in our upward course, they would be confirmed in their belief. It would be a sad day for this nation, the death-knell of our greatness, if the course pursued by Nebraska in taking the Bible out of the hands of the children became general through our country.

Memorial Bibles

"My aged father," a subscriber writes, "was so happy over the Red Letter Bible I was enabled to give him last Christmas, through your kindness in sending it out as a premium. This year, as a tribute to his memory, I mean to send six white-haired friends of mine (among them some too poor to secure a nice Bible for themselves) a copy each of this sacred volume, where the dear Lord's words shine out in red. That means that I shall be able to make twelve people happy; for the six subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that go with the Bibles I shall send to another set of friends, who will esteem such gift a great blessing. This is my Christmas memorial to my father." The Red Letter Bible can be secured, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $3.

That Things are No Worse

ONCE in a while we may do well to stop and praise God that things are no worse. We are so apt to take our blessings for granted, and to be "ready with complaint in this fair world of God's," that we overlook the goodness that crowns our lot, and makes every day a milestone that should be marked with rejoicing. That things are no worse, is perhaps a rather pessimistic phrase, but suppose we look at it dispassionately. We are handicapped, it may be, by material losses, but then we have a roof over our heads, and are protected from the weather. We cannot drive about in carriages as our wealthy fellow-townsmen do, but we have good legs, and can walk wherever we choose. Should we fall and hurt a knee-cap or sprain an ankle, we would have cause to appreciate the value of sturdy legs. We have little margin for luxuries in our scheme of living, but we have also few bills with the doctors. From the crushing solicitudes and the great afflictions that beset some pathways, we are measurably free, and therefore we may well thank God that things are no worse. To cultivate a sunny optimism is to behave with common sense. To make a careful estimate now and then of our advantages, to sum up the cheerful elements in our lot, and to be glad on principle, are obligations which we owe to God, from whom we receive so much, to whom we should ever lift a psalm of praise.

The Sunday School Teacher's Help

"In the preparation of my Sunday School lesson," writes a Sunday School teacher, "I find the Bible Dictionary which you give as a premium an excellent help; and through its aid I am saved much time. Research through many books would not secure for me so quickly or accurately the information condensed in this one volume." This book, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, for $2.

Crowding Out God

NOT very long ago, a poor missionary and his wife, who had been laboring all their lives in a foreign land to bring the heathen to Christ and to heal the sick, came to New York on a visit. They were utter strangers in the great city. They had been told by travelers of its vast population, its stupendous wealth, and its mighty buildings like unto Babel in altitude. They had come, after much prayer and preparation, and when they arrived, they went confidently to the homes and the business places of the rich, believing that the simple tale of their labors among the heathen in that far-away land would surely touch all hearts, and that gifts would be poured into their laps by those who were eager to share the blessing that follows upon well-doing.

Poor, simple souls! Ere they had been a day in the metropolis they were disillusioned. In their offices, and even at their homes, the busy money-makers were so absorbed in the affairs of the world that they could not spare a moment to the missionaries. So the two strangers, wandering in the crowded corridors and passages of the Babel-like buildings, found themselves jostled and hustled until they were sorely perplexed. Besides, the strange jargon of the business world smote harshly upon their ears. It was the language of a world that was to them even more alien than their own far-off heathen land. Possibly, amid all the confusion, it may have occurred to them that, after all, they had reached the wrong destination, and that some unkind fate had set them down in a strange capital. There, before them, lay the great city, toiling and sweating and groaning at its ceaseless task of accumulation, which seemed to harden its heart to the divine call of duty and to close its ears to human sympathy. And the little missionary, in recording afterwards his observations on this strange spectacle, sincerely pitied the people whose energies were so centered in their slavish task that all else was forgotten—no time for leisure or innocent relaxation; none for the cultivation of those kindly qualities that make the whole world happier; none for preparation for the hereafter. And he wondered whether, amid all this multitude of business, they could find time to die!

Friends and help came after a while to the missionary, and he found that there were many in the busy city, who were quietly and unostentatiously serving God, though the clamor and din of traffic were everywhere around them. But he will hardly be able ever to wholly forget his first experience, when he felt convinced that the people were wholly given over to mammon. It is true that a very small coin, held before the eye, will shut out the sunlight, and that great wealth, hugged too close to the heart, may lead a man to forget God. The case of such a one is pitiable, indeed.

"A Gift for Papa"

"My brother and I are going to give our papa a Red Letter Bible for his Christmas present," a wee maid writes. "We've been saving our pennies, nickels and dimes ever so long to give him a Christmas present, and we just didn't know what to buy; but mamma read out to us about your Red Letter Bible, and said she thought that would just please papa. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that comes with it for one year, she says, we may send to a lady whom we know, who has to work very hard, and who cannot take a paper. We had nearly three dollars saved up in our bank. Mamma gave us the rest, and we are to pay it back to her when we make it picking threads off the floor and running errands, for we want our present to papa to be our very own." The Red Letter Bible can be secured, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $3.

Unnecessary Publicity

THE admirers of realism in fiction should be highly gratified by the present methods of daily journalism. There probably never was a time when the proceedings of our civil and criminal courts were presented so vividly, in so picturesque a style and with such photographic effect. The appearance of the defendant, the dress of the witnesses, especially if they are women, the manner and enunciation of the judge and the lawyers are fully described, and the evidence is recorded in all its details, no matter how loathsome they may be.

No one would wish that star-chamber methods should be adopted; the public has a right to know the facts in important trials, and there can be no doubt that publicity has a wholesome effect on the conduct of our courts. But is it necessary, or is it beneficial, that all the revolting details of crimes should be presented, especially in so piquant a style? Is it wise that the public should be informed how certain deadly poisons can be compounded and what poisons can be administered without detection? Such information, distributed broadcast, can serve no useful purpose and may be used by evil-disposed persons to very evil ends. Indeed, it is precisely the information such persons are most anxious to obtain. They learn, too, just where the defendant blundered and how he might have escaped detection. It is a species of education that is of inestimable value to the foes of society, but not to society itself. These careful and ably-written descriptions have, also, the effect of raising the defendant to the rank of a hero. The morbid mind, as it reads the description of his dress, his smile, his pallor, his imperturbability, learns that the publicity, often so dear to it, may be obtained through a trial, and rushes into crime with the consolatory reflection that, even if detected, a certain eminence will be gained which could never be achieved by ordinary good behavior.

The divorce courts especially, would have a less pernicious influence, if the reporter contented himself with a mere statement of decisions. It is grievous that the sanctity of the marriage vow should so frequently be violated as it is, and the publication of the dissolution of a marriage might operate as a warning against hasty and ill-considered unions; but nothing but harm can come of the coarse, and sometimes filthy, story which is spread before the indiscriminate readers of a daily journal when one of these cases is before the court.

That there is complicity between the public and the journalist must be admitted. If there were no demand for such literary food it would not be supplied. The journalist is simply satisfying a public craving; but in that fact there is degradation, and there is, too, a danger that he cultivates and stimulates the appetite that he gratifies.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST S. H. HADLEY, of the Water Street Mission, New York, recently conducted twenty-five meetings at Denver, Colorado Springs, Colorado City, Victor, and Cripple Creek. The spiritual results of these meetings were very gratifying.

—REV. E. P. HAMMOND, the well-known evangelist, has been assisting Rev. Robert Wasson, pastor of the M. E. Church in East Norwich, N. Y. A series of very interesting services for young people resulted in a number publicly confessing Christ.

—REV. ALBERT R. SITTON, of Garfield, Mo., has recently held a three weeks' series of revival meetings at Cotton Creek, Mo., with gratifying results. One hundred and fifty confessed Christ, and there were one hundred and thirty-four accessions to the churches, and sixty-seven baptisms.

—TO THE WOMEN of America, the name of Elizabeth Cady Stanton will ever stand as the synonym for true nobility. Two generations of women have benefited by her unselfish labors, which resulted in the passage of laws that were essential to social purity and justice. To her broad, generous mind, it was a singular anomaly that while woman, even in a despotism, could aspire to the highest honors, here, in a free and enlightened republic, she was not considered qualified to exercise the privilege that was accorded to the most ignorant alien who ever reached these shores.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Premier in an Ox-wagon

THE uneasiness of "the head that wears a crown," has, in these democratic days, largely transferred itself to the head of the chief officer of the crown. It is especially so in Italy, where the Premier, Signor Zanardelli, is valorously striving to conduct the King's government. He is opposed by a large number of small factions in the Italian Parliament, which harass him at every step, but are none of them strong enough to displace him. What would happen if two or three factions could forget their mutual animosity and unite on a popular programme, it is easy to foresee. Poor Zanardelli would be outvoted and driven from office. Thus far, there are no indications of such a combination, so Zanardelli survives by grace of the division of his antagonists. But the difficulties in the Parliament are not the only problem that the Premier has to solve. The agricultural and industrial situation is still more ominous. The picture of the peasant toiling with a soldier on his back, applies to Italy more forcibly than to any other country in Europe. The army is too large for the resources of the nation, and the consequent burden of taxation is enormous. There are strikes both in the industries of the north and in the farms of the south, and it is a significant fact that in both cases the strikers do not blame the employers for reducing wages, but the Government, whose taxes have made the reduction necessary. There is, however, one element of strength that Zanardelli has. He is personally popular with the working-men, who believe that he is sincerely desirous of easing their burdens. He has given evidence of his sympathy by making a personal tour of Southern Italy, where the agricultural problem is acute. He traveled in a most democratic way, in a common ox-wagon, stopping in the villages to talk with the farm laborers and to find out their actual condition. In making such a journey, the aged Premier showed his wisdom. The only sure way of helping men is to come into personal contact with them. The salvation of the world has become a possibility in just that way. God in Christ came to men.

But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and being found in fashion as a man he humbled himself (Phil. 2: 7).

Saved from the Wreck

Ten men and a woman landed in New York on November 6, after a terrible experience. They had been on board a vessel of Nova Scotia, bound for Buenos Ayres. After leaving port, they had fair weather for thirty-five days, and had reached a point only fifteen degrees from the equator, when, without warning, their vessel was struck by a hurricane. It tore the sails to shreds and broke the masts, leaving jagged stumps twenty feet above the deck. The vessel was completely disabled and beyond control. Signals of distress were hoisted, and lights were burned at night, but they were not seen. Twenty-seven days they stayed on the crippled vessel, which drifted helplessly on the waves. They then decided to abandon the ship. The remaining provisions, little more than bread and water, were put on board the boat that the storm had spared, and the little party set out, hoping to reach land. Ten days and nights they were exposed to the weather before the lookout gladdened every one with the cry of "Land ahead." It proved to be Grenada, the most southern of the Windward Isles. They were hospitably received, and were sheltered and cared for until a passing steamer called at Grenada and brought them to New York. The crew say that during that terrible time of suspense and hardship, the strongest sank in despair. They would have completely lost heart and given up the struggle had it not been for the cheerfulness and courage of the only woman on board, the wife of the captain, a lady only twenty-three years old, whose untiring devotion and unwavering hope gave courage to all. Even a strong man could have been better spared from the boat than she, who cheered and encouraged the others. So much can the small and the weak do in the work of the world.

God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty (1. Cor. 1: 27).

A Record Telegram

An interesting telegraphic experiment has been made by the former President of the Erie Telephone Company. He is at present residing at Boston, Mass., but still takes a deep interest in the developed an eminence in that sphere as high as he has attained in the physical sphere, the forces of which the ancient seer thought God alone could control:

Hear attentively the noise of his voice and the sound that goeth out of his mouth; he directeth it under the whole heaven and his lightning unto the ends of the earth (Job 37: 2).

Quaint Burial Fancies

An undertaker, who has retired from business after a long business career, has recently given to the press some reminiscences of his work. In one instance, he says, a woman sent for him some time before her death, and insisted on his pledging himself to clothe her completely, when the time came for her to lie in her would be certain to produce jealousy and ill-feeling, no matter which of the rivals might have them, she determined to be buried in them. The undertaker was laid under strict injunctions, and he carried them out. On one of the hottest days of summer, the old lady was laid to rest in a suit of furs fit for a journey to the Arctic circle. It is strange that so much thought and care should be given to the body, that must soon turn to dust, while so little is given to the soul, that must live through the ages.

Take no thought saying . . . wherewithal shall we be clothed . . . but seek ye first the kingdom of God (Matt. 6: 31, 33).

Washington's Oak

A visitor to South Carolina tells an interesting story of a fine oak tree which he saw near the South Santee River, between Georgetown and Charleston. It is called Washington's Oak, and on inquiring the reason, found that it owes its life to the Father of his Country. He was making a tour through the State in 1791, and spent a day and a night at a mansion by the way. He took a great interest in the garden near the house and complimented the mistress on its condition. The beauty of the trees impressed him especially. As he stood on the veranda waiting for his escort, as the hour for leaving arrived, he mentioned the trees again, and pointing to a young oak immediately in front of him, said, "A hundred years from now that tree will probably be the finest of them all. Its shape is perfect." The lady said she had intended cutting it down, as it was too near the house. Washington protested. "Do not disturb it," he said, "its beauty should be its protection." The lady promised that it should remain as a tribute to her guest. She laid special injunctions on her descendants to the same effect. The tree still stands in glorious beauty after one hundred and eleven years. Washington would rejoice if he could see now how his prediction has been fulfilled; how much more if he could see how the nation he did so much to preserve from being rooted up, has, like the tree, grown in beauty and power.

A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation (Isa 60: 22).

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. C. H. Yatman has just closed a series of union meetings in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and now begins special services in Chicago, with Rev. W. H. Geistmeyer, D. D., of Tabernacle Baptist Church. In January he goes to Kansas City, Mo.

Dr. Atwood, the American Board's missionary in Shansi, China, reports that the work in that province is now better provided for in buildings and grounds than it was before the Boxer outbreak. Missionary work has been resumed on both stations, under native leaders.

The Medical Officer of Health of Manchester, Eng., calls attention in a recent report to the prevalence of consumption in the ranks of working men. He believes that it is largely due to their frequenting uncleanly saloons, the floors of which, he declares, are often hotbeds of bacteria.

Miss Helen Gould is urging upon the women who will be prominent in the coming World's Fair at St. Louis, that they use their positions as managers and promoters of the enterprise to exclude from the fair all such indecent exhibitions as disgraced the Midway of the Chicago Exposition.

A daily meeting for prayer and praise is being held at noon in Tremont Temple, Boston, beginning Nov. 10. Dr. A. C. Dixon preaches each day, and an after-meeting is conducted by Christian workers. It is intended to continue the services for at least two weeks, after which they will be held in Faneuil Hall.

Major George A. Hilton has been holding evangelistic meetings in Fresno, Calif. His many friends in all parts of the country will rejoice that he has fully recovered from a long and critical illness, which kept him a prisoner through the summer. He has arranged for a long series of services which, beginning with Kansas City, Mo., take him through Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

Any reader of this journal who knows of an opening, either in his own household or business, or in those of some friend or acquaintance, can secure, at nominal expense, the services of a good, reliable "handy man," a native of Persia, who is a Christian and well recommended. Also an Armenian man, as household, hotel or store help. For all particulars, address "Help," CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

ment of communication by wire. A few days ago he started a telegraphic message on a journey around the world as a test of the efficiency of telegraphic service. He telegraphed to Vancouver, B. C., with a request that the message should be sent all around the world. The manager of the office there entered enthusiastically into the experiment and forwarded it by cable to Sydney, N. S. W., whence it was sent to Europe and so forwarded until it was delivered to the gentleman from whom it emanated at his hotel in Boston. It had taken thirty-nine hours and twenty minutes to make the circuit of the globe, including the time occupied in repetition. It was an impressive proof of the power man has gained over the forces of nature. If he had striven as earnestly for spiritual power, he might by this time have attained an eminence in that sphere as high as he has attained in the physical sphere, the forces of which the ancient seer thought God alone could control: Hear attentively the noise of his voice and the sound that goeth out of his mouth; he directeth it under the whole heaven and his lightning unto the ends of the earth (Job 37: 2).

A CHAPEL ON A WAR-SHIP'S DECK

VISITORS to the U. S. S. Minneapolis, now "Receiving Ship" at the League Island (Pa.) Navy Yard, are always impressed with the activity on board. At present there are upward of nine hundred men attached to her. It is seldom one sees so many men on a man-of-war of the displacement of the Minneapolis. The reason she carries a the spiritual, as well as the social and physical side of his men, the captain is mindful.

Ship's chaplain, Rev. H. W. Jones, D.D., specially known for his connection with the Texas, conducts services every Lord's Day morning, when large and attentive audiences, sometimes as many as eight hundred sailors, greet him. In Captain Goodrich, Chaplain Jones has a staunch supporter, as the captain is seldom, if ever, absent from worship; it is his custom to attend with the members of his family, who are familiar figures at church; the men would miss them were they absent. The chaplain has also a corps of noble helpers in a band of young people, who, no matter what the weather may be, are to be found on board, to lead the singing and otherwise show interest; these young men and women have organized themselves into "The Floating Committee of The Holland Presbyterian Church," which stands at Federal and Broad streets, Philadelphia. Our Navy has reason to be proud of the Minneapolis, not only because she is our fastest cruiser, but because of the examples which her sailors and marines set in the matter of church attendance—an example which may well cause the best young landmen in our country to look to their laurels.

The Minneapolis is altogether inadequate to the accommodation of such large gatherings as attend the services, and up to a recent Sunday, church had to be held on the superstructure deck, which is in the open air, with simply an awning for roof. Captain Goodrich realized the fact that the weather would soon interfere with the arrangement, and he requested of the Navy Department the use of one of the buildings in the Yard, which petition was immediately granted.

Through the courtesy of Captain Goodrich, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is able to show its readers some views of divine services in the United States Navy. In the first picture the men are crowding the ship's gangway at the sound of the church-call on the bugle. In the second, they are gathering for service on the superstructure deck. The last was taken on the wharf at the Navy Yard where church was held. They are a fine, sturdy looking lot of young fellows; God grant that all the boys who are being enlisted into our Navy may be enlisted likewise in Christ's service.

number so far in excess of her regular complement lies in the large percentage of landmen aboard for training. Many of these are absent from home for the first time in their lives, having recently enlisted either in the Western or Southern States. Among them are numerous representatives of well known Southern families. A striking illustration of the fact that we are one people to-day is found here: swinging in their hammocks every night in peaceful slumber, side by side, are the boys of the North and the boys of the South; they are drilled and mustered side by side. Life aboard ship is vastly different to what these young men were accustomed to on the Western or Southern farms, and very naturally they grow homesick before they become accustomed to the service. To prevent such conditions, Captain C. F. Goodrich, the ship's commander, whose attention is devoted to the interest of his men, and who is a firm believer in the value of athletic sports, encourages the boys to frequent the golf links at the Yard every afternoon; on Saturday mornings there are enthusiastic and warmly contested boat races on the Delaware River. A Home Bible Lesson

Mothers reading to children chapters in the dear old Book of books, are often concerned because they are unable to arouse the little one's interest in the text. Writ in days when customs were not as ours, and in a land whose ways are even now entirely different from ours, no wonder the narrative seems unreal to wee hearers. One mother writes us: "My plan now is to read the chapter first and study it with the aid of your Bible Dictionary, looking up every implement, article of wearing apparel, decorative ornament, or peculiar custom mentioned; and then, as I read aloud to my little boy, I explain these things to him, and let him question me about them, showing him the pictures in every possible case. He has a fancy for architecture, and through the illustrations and articles on 'House,' 'Inn' (or Khan) and kindred subjects, I first won his attention. Then he took an interest in other things; the 'Olive Tree and Oil Press' pleased him greatly. My little girl, who is fond of music, was delighted with the division and pictures on that subject." American Ladies Entertain the Princesses of China quivering velvet butterfly, studded with precious stones. Considering that they had never before been in a foreign house, and knew absolutely nothing of our customs, their ease of manner, perfect tact and courtesy, were little short of marvelous. Immediately upon their arrival they went out to tiffin (luncheon), each legation lady taking a Chinese lady by the hand, and escorting her to her place at the table.

Mrs. Conger had decided upon a regular American luncheon of fifteen courses, without a single Chinese dish, or even the sign of a chop-stick.

Upon reaching their places at the table, all the ladies stood while Mrs. Conger raised her glass of the crystal water from the Summer Palace, and gave the following toast: "Let us drink of the sparkling waters of this beautiful land, to the health of the Emperor and Empress Dowager of China, and to the peace and prosperity of their people." To this the Princess Imperial very gracefully responded: "I bring the greetings of the Empress Dowager herself to this company. She sincerely and earnestly hopes that the pleasant relations at present existing between China and America may always continue as they now are."

Then the ladies were seated, and for two hours partook of a most bountiful tiffin. Their efforts to use knives and forks were quite as amusing to themselves as to their hostesses, but they were very observant, and copied the American fashion of eating with much skill

They were not a bit afraid of the foreign food and tried every dish.

After the luncheon the whole party repaired to the drawing-room. All the Manchu women smoke pipes, but on this occasion they had brought cigarettes, determined to be quite foreign. Photographs and articles about the room greatly interested them, and they listened eagerly to anything our ladies told them. Mrs. Gattrell and Mrs. Kilbourne sang for them, but they did not understand the music, and politely asked "what the ladies were doing."

Finally the entertainment drew to an end; the beautiful sedan chairs passed through the legation gate, and the court-yard was clear once more.

THE DOWAGER EMPRESS

I.—The Right to be Born Well and to be Welcome

IN many respects the Twentieth Century Child is a fortunate being. It must have been simply dreadful to undergo the harsh discipline which was the common experience of children well-born or lowly-bred, some centuries ago. The little prince was not much better off than the little churl, so far as parental severity was concerned, in days when the rod was always in pickle for every small transgression. We have all heard of poor Lady Jane Grey, wonder of learning, grace and sweetness that she was, so early, alas! doomed to lay that fair head of hers on the block and suffer martyrdom for the offences of her ambitious relatives; but none of us have forgotten the nips and pinches, and daily chastening to which, as a little maid, she was subjected at the hands of her stern father and mother. Schoolmasters used to be outrageously cruel in their treatment of their pupils, and thus, Alice Morse Earle tells us, that if a Colonial child was whipped in school for any misdemeanor, he or she was quite liable to be again whipped at home the same day for the crime of having been already whipped. The Twentieth Century Child has the advantage on its side, is better off than its ancestors were in their childhood, and its morals and manners should be, and no doubt often are, correspondingly finer than those of its predecessors.

The child of to-day is not always sure of its welcome. In the old days most families were large, and the merry brood tumbling over one another till they were eight and ten and twelve brothers and sisters around one hearth, were accepted as God's best gifts. I have beside me the genealogy of an old and very honorable New England clan; family after family is mentioned in its annals, few groups less than ten, and in one case the number is seventeen. Our little circles, enriched by one golden head, or by three at most, were undreamed of in those simpler and more heroic times. Not that I am declaiming against a small family. The theme is one on which much may be said, and said with candor and earnestness of conviction on both sides. Many an American parent feels that to bring up one or two children aright, educate them, and give them a good start in the world, is more his duty than to struggle on half-feeding and half-clothing and half-instructing a much larger number.

But certainly the little one who comes into this life, by no volition of its own, beginning the career of an immortal soul in God's world, has a right to be welcome. It has a right to the best prenatal conditions that can be given a babe. The mother, knowing the new pulse that shall catch its beat from hers, should be serene, sweet, gentle, cheery. "If you want that baby to be good when it comes," I once heard a wise old woman say to a young wife expecting her first-born, "you must be good yourself." And it was true. The more even, and trustful, and care-free, and self-controlled the mother, before the hour of birth, the lovelier in look and disposition will be the child. I love to fancy that Mary, the mother of Jesus, had only sweet, pure thoughts, only gladness of hope, only uplift of prayer, before she brought forth her Son, whose name was to be Immanuel, and laid him in the manger.

It is the right of the baby to come and to be made welcome. Be the home ever so plain, the babe will brighten it; be the means ever so small, love will make them sufficient. And if the mother can possibly do so, she should herself nurse the little one, and avail herself of the wisdom of modern science, that she may give the child physically a splendid outfit of vigor—a good working capital against the days to come. The care a child receives in the nursery may shield it from the inroads of insidious disease in later years. Fresh air, food at proper intervals, and, above all else, tranquillity in its environment, are essentials in a child's body-building.

As the little one learns to use hands, and feet, and tongue, the religious training should begin. Nothing is more foolish, more recklessly blundering, than to defer this most important training until the earliest years are past. There is something akin to the miracle in the rapidity with which an infant grows and learns in the first two years. Impressions made on the baby brain are ineffaceable. Before the little one can speak, the mother should fold the dimpled hands, and say its little prayer for it. There should never be a moment of conscious life, when as a flower to the sun, the little one is not turned with its face to the Lord. If mothers are only true to the Saviour in the first seven years of their children's existence, the Evil One may strive in vain for those young spirits. God and mother have had them first.

Here, too, comes a great responsibility for the father.

HOPE

When days are dark and dreary,
And trees are brown and bare,
When not a bird is singing,
And frost is everywhere.
Then Hope, serene and smiling,
Waves flowery wands on high,
And lights a gleam of gladness
Upon the wintry sky.

Her eyes are full of brightness,
Her step is light and free,
She brings the thought of blossoms
Dear friend, to you and me.
Hope, child of love and longing;
Hope, maiden of my dreams,
Who shows what is exalting
Above what merely seems.

Mothers should not bring up their children alone. Fathers are so much away from the home during the six working days, earning the support for the home, that they are sometimes practically strangers to their offspring. This is a pity. It is also a great pity when they are held up to their children merely as the strong arm of authority. Very little children should never fear their fathers, nor should punishment be associated with them. Tenderness, strength, love, and a good example, children should in the youthful years look for and find in their father. When a man is habitually considerate, cautious and refined in his behavior at home, his boys will imitate him. When he worships God, they will reverence their Heavenly Father.

Among the best influences that can be brought to bear upon the Twentieth Century Child, I unhesitatingly name family prayer. This need not be a long service, a weariness to the flesh. Just a few verses read, a little prayer made, but the sweet service never omitted, and it draws the whole family, by invisible lines of attraction, nearer to the throne of God.

Whenever it is practicable, the child's first school should be the kindergarten. There are free kindergartens almost everywhere, so that few are excluded from these beautiful opportunities. A child who goes to kindergarten before attending the primary school learns faster, uses the reasoning faculties better, and is quicker of perception and more easily interested than one who has not been thus gently led along in a school where work is play and play is work.

And yet another right of the growing child is to have plenty of time for play and a place to play in. Our cities are most uncomfortable places for boys between seven and twelve, for they may neither run nor shout nor play baseball nor football, nor do any one of a dozen innocent things in which boys take delight. Fortunate is the country lad, with great spaces outdoors to play in, and definite chores night and morning to give a healthful amount of useful labor to add poise and stability to the boy's character. Recreation is as needful to young creatures as the air they inhale in their lungs, as the books they study, as the manual arts they acquire.

Speaking of manual arts, every boy and girl has a right to some careful training in the deft and dexterous use of his hands. In our haste to educate the brain we often neglect the hands. To know how to manage one's hands, to handle tools, to be a carpenter or a good mechanic; to know how to drive, how to row a boat, to ride a horse, to do things generally with ease and aplomb, is to be exceptionally well equipped for whatever the years may bring.

What an Old Housekeeper Says

"Yes, it is sometimes hard work to get the cooking and washing and ironing done, but I have found it a good plan not to be too systematic. I learned from an old Welsh friend years ago, that one might do a great deal in the early morning, and then take the rest of the day more at her ease."

"Yes, Molly," said Cousin Kitty, "one may if she live alone, but suppose one has several hungry hired men, who want three big meals a day. What may she do to lighten her burden?"

"The problem is beyond me," frankly answered Molly; "but this I will say, no woman should be compelled to do all the indoor work with her own hands, when her husband is employing the help of several hired men. It isn't fair. Women do have the very heaviest end."

"Well, sometimes there is a mortgage, and the wife wants it lifted as much as the husband does."

"That may be, but he needn't kill her in order to pay it."

"Well, I am a believer in system. Yet you are, or were, an old-fashioned housekeeper. Dear, dear."

"I am, and I was in the past, a thorough and fastidious housewife," said the first speaker; "but I know now that the life is more than meat. I shall not be able to do much for my growing boys and girls when I am lying with folded hands in the churchyard. I'd rather live, if I can, until they are grown up. I shall be a better comrade to my husband if I hold him up to an endeavor to take care of me, as well as of the crops and the cows and horses. I am learning how to take care of my physical life, a thing many a woman of forty-five ignores, and, because of her ignoring, either drifts into invalidism or dies. Don't work so hard, cousin. Take a hint from me, and save your energy for another day."

A Treasure for Reading Circles

Every reading circle, every literary club, every private or public library, ought to have a copy of the Hall of Fame. Rarely, if ever before, in so short a compass was so much historic information and patriotic inspiration crowded. No history club or class should be without this book; as the building which it describes, giving sketches and portraits of every famous name upon the walls, is perhaps the most representative American institution in existence, this may be said to be the most representative American book. This book, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $2.00.

NATIONAL CONFIDENCE

TEXT -- Hebrews 1: 10, 11, 12: "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands. They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail."

A NEW SERMON BY THE REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON

GOD has always been present in history. It is because his ways are not as our ways, and his thoughts are not as our thoughts, that men have sometimes feared, and sometimes said "there is no God any more."

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON

But of this we may be sure, God is always present, and always active. We may not see his mighty arm nor hear the still, small voice, but it is impossible to think of a loving Father, divine, all-powerful, intelligent, sitting off somewhere in space remote from his children, doing nothing, caring nothing for them. Man has made history and left out God. Nevertheless, God was there, for all history contains God, whether the human historian gives him a place in its annals or not.

And if God is with the world at all times, most certainly is he with it during its crises of history, during vast calamities, great financial disasters, unparalleled trouble and widespread unrest. God allows men to govern or try to govern themselves. He does not step in and do everything himself. But through and in all experiments of nations, God is present, and ready to help. He certainly does not banish himself from the world just when the world is most in need of his wisdom and his love.

National Crises

Now one of two things has always been the result of what we call great crises in history. Men have either felt God's presence in wonderful power, or they have deserted him altogether. They have either turned to him as the only refuge left, or they have turned away from him and gone their own ways alone. That was what France did after the Revolution, while America under her revolution kept alive a warm spirit of devotion and religious belief. A great deal depends on the way an individual or a nation acts during serious trouble or crisis. Out of loss, affliction, sorrow, accident, plague, distress, for one man comes a clearer knowledge of the Divine, and a sweeter, deeper life experience; for another man comes bitterness, disbelief, hardness. Just as some men let the hypocrisy of some other man determine for them all their own faith in the Divine, so for some men the event of any trouble or loss is enough to destroy all the hope and faith they had in a God or hereafter. But if men and nations have an abiding knowledge of the continual presence of the Divine in history, the rising tides of history only lift them nearer God. That is what we want to pray and work for in this age—that our nation, that the world, may turn to God as the greatest, most real, most important, most needful of all facts to-day.

No one denies that we are in need of him in a peculiar sense. No one denies that it is a crisis in the history of man. The storm which has been raging over the social condition of the race has reached its height. We are on the crest of the wave. There is also a crisis in the affairs of the church, according to some of the most thoughtful leaders in the church. Over the globe runs the tremor of mighty events soon to take place. At such a time and with such history making, nothing can be of such lasting power and blessing to us as individuals, and as a country, as to turn with all our hearts and minds to the Divine presence in history, an abiding principle, a fixed and unalterable fact, as much a reality as gravitation, as hopeful as the shining of the sun, as quieting to man's passions as the brooding spirit of the creation over the heaving waters of the first tumultuous tempest of the earth.

If at this time we all turn to God, to him who abideth ever, to him whose years do not fail; if in loving faith we really confess our need of him and pray to him for help and wisdom we shall certainly be delivered from evil, and the world will roll on with an outlook before it full of the promise of a millennium of baptism from the Holy Ghost. O that we may thus turn to him and acknowledge that he is God, and that there is none else able to save.

What is the result of turning to God at times of great need, and reposing on him as the eternal presence of power in history?

The Source of Peace

I think the first result to an individual or a nation is Peace. This does not mean laziness, indifference, cowardice, lack of responsibility, or overconfidence. This is what it means: Suppose you are a soldier. There is going to be a battle. There is a probability that in that battle you may be killed. Suppose you are on the side that has a just cause. You are going to fight for liberty, home, truth, right. Your commander is a person you can and do most completely trust. You know he is superior to the opposing leader in courage, skill and force. You know that even if he is beaten in this battle and you are killed, yet in the end he will conquer and the right will triumph. Ah! Then you can march into that battle with peace in your soul. You are not indifferent, nor cowardly, nor overconfident; you fight, you are active, you do something, yea, you fight as if it all depended on you whether the victory be won; but you are at peace in your soul. That is like the peace of the man or nation that at any crisis of history turns to God and reposes on his power. And that is not a little thing, that peace. It is what Christ promised his disciples just before his death. It is a grand, a wonderful, an unusual thing, that divine thing, peace. How many men of your acquaintance have that peace of soul? Not indifference, stupidity, self-satisfaction, lazy contentment in pleasure—no, no, none of those, but the Peace of God, that flows only out of the throne of God.

The Supreme Need

If there is anything the world needs to-day it is the Peace of God. Unrest, dissatisfaction, discontent, these tear at the heart of the world. A feverish unrest boils over our splendid civilization. Its demands grow more exacting on brain and heart and home. The world must turn to God soon or it will grow mad through its nervous lack of spiritual repose. We need an equipoise, a steadier of life, a leaning-back on something with eternal written on its forehead. Once more does the world, heaving with its night storm, need to hear the voice of the Master as he shall rise in the place of his own quiet rest, and stretch out his calm and majestic hand over the raging water, and cry, with complete and instant lordship, "Peace, be still!" Yes, the world needs the Peace of God, and it can find it only by turning to where it can be found, in the eternal bosom of the eternal presence of God in history.

Another result of turning to God at times of great need is Hope. The individual who reposes in the Divine has always the cheerful thought to carry through all trouble, "My sins are forgiven, my iniquity is blotted out, I have eternal life." The nation that turns to God has always the hopeful spirit that looks on the strongest and best in its own history. It gives a man or a nation a wonderful uplift to feel that God is near. You know the doctors always have more hope for those patients who have great hope for themselves. A good deal of the sickness of the world is as much as of trouble. He who believes in God believes in all good things. The man who has little faith has little work. We go to the Divine in a crisis of life and we say, "Lord, it seems pretty dark and gloomy, but our souls repose on thee as the hope of the world." And once close by his side he says, "There is a good deal of cheer yet." That is what he says to the world to-day. "Behold the praying mothers and fathers of the world. Behold the consecrated intelligence of your college and university youth growing up to take responsible places as statesmen. Behold the churches that are not all given over to display and architecture and formality, doing Christ's work in the slums and on the frontier. Behold an age which, in spite of its materialism, still is not an age of infidel thought, but rather of honest search for truth. Behold a vast array of goodness penetrating society and forbidding much evil that once was tolerated." That is the way the Divine breathes hope into the human when man turns to him.

An Inspiration of Hope

Hope! That makes good citizenship. The men who preach and talk and believe in nothing but destruction for the nation as the final result of all the present trouble are not safe leaders, they are not the men to be trusted, they are dangerous to the well-being of society. I have no faith in a careless indifferent attitude towards the public well-being. Least of all with that selfishness which goes its way at the present crisis, enjoying itself and reckless of the future so long as present happiness may be secured. But there is an attitude which every true man should maintain, an attitude of earnest endeavor to do all with God's help that can be done to make the world continually better, and in and through it all should run a golden thread of hope for the world, his country and himself. Despair has no place with him. No man has any right to prophesy bad or gloomy things of this Republic who has been into the presence chamber of the Divine and stayed there long enough to catch the glow of his sunrising. Hope on and hope ever, is the motto of the man who turns to God, and even through toil and disappointment and heartache and thwarting of ambition and seeming defeat, there runs the courage of the strong assurance "for underneath are the everlasting arms and he shall sustain thee."

The Statesman's Guide

Another result of turning to the Eternal Presence in History at times of crisis is Wisdom. If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. Does not that mean the statesmen and Congressmen of to-day? Who says that in this nation any one man is wise enough to devise just exactly the best measures for the good of the whole country? If ever a nation needed help from God to direct its affairs, ours does. There are almost as many remedies for the sickness of the times as there are States in the Union. There is a perfect chaos of reasons for and remedies for the social difficulties. And every man is sure that he is right, and all the rest are wrong. Do we not need wisdom from a divine source? And is not the promise exact and positive? "If any of you"—that means all men—"lack wisdom"—that certainly means our nation—"let him ask of God," not of human statesmen and human opinion, but of God, "who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not," he will not refuse us even if we ask foolishly if we ask sincerely, "And it, wisdom, shall be given him." What more could we ask? Certainly the wisdom referred to does not mean simply spiritual or religious knowledge of God. It means what wisdom always means in the Bible Applied Knowledge; knowledge of financial affairs, knowledge of social affairs. It is positively sure that if this nation turned to God and sincerely asked for wisdom to direct its affairs with wisdom that such

not to conduct a Sunday School or a prayer meeting, but wisdom to conduct the affairs of a government. God knows more about the best ways of managing the finances of a country than the wisest of men. It follows, therefore, that if men will ask him for wisdom on that point, he will be able to give it, for that is the promise. And in other matters, in all matters we will get wisdom by going to him. He will show us how to use our own powers better. He will guide us in matters where we feel as if we could not decide alone. The only condition is that we come to him and ask, feeling our lack, and he will give.

Another result of turning to God in times of need is the courage which comes to us from the knowledge that we are co-workers with God in building up his kingdom. This gives us a noble thought of ourselves, and furnishes us with needed inspiration and enthusiasm. As Paul says, "We are laborers together with God." We may not understand altogether why, but it is true in the redemption of the world, the reforming of it, human beings with Divine help are going to do it.

It is God's Way

Man, be assured, is not going to do it alone. Suppose we were allowed to fall back on our weakness and our human limitations; God says, "You, poor, weak man, you need not put yourself to any trouble to help make things any better. I will do it all, I am omnipotent. You may please yourself while I do it. I made the world, and it is my affair to make it right now that it is going wrong." What a poor, contemptible creature man would then be, shunning all responsibility, knowing nothing of self-denial, living to himself alone, destitute of the strength that comes from struggle, ignorant of the joy that springs from victory. And, on the other hand, suppose God said to us, "The whole affair of fighting sin and bringing in the reign of peace is yours. You need not look to me for help. You brought your own evils on yourselves by your disobedience. It is your duty now to extricate yourselves all alone." What then had been the bitter burden mankind had carried with it as it toiled painfully over the road of life! But no! The divine and the human go together through this world! That is the blessed consolation of life! God says, "Son, daughter, take my hand. Rest your burden on my strength. Fight, but feel me near to help. It is your own battle, and I cannot fight it all for you, but I will fight it with you."

Divine Co-operation

Truly is it said, "one with God is a majority." And oh that the nation might turn heart and mind to him now and feel his presence near, feel conscious of his fellowship with the race, know and know deep down in the real life that the national life must be lived with God. It means a great deal that the Divine works for us. It means a great deal more that he works with us. There is a sweetness in fellowship which is not found in allowing some one to give or do outside of our sharing with it. Sharing! That is a divine thing. The thought that God shares my joys, griefs, ambitions, hopes, desires, aspirations, enthusiasms, is a thought so great that sometimes it seems almost as if it could not be true. And yet I am assured again and again that it is true. He is Immanuel, God with us; "like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." He understands us. He is at all points with us. And he is willing to work with humanity until the last enemy of heaven is conquered, and the last sinful man redeemed who is willing to listen to his voice as he pleads through us. Do you not see what power can come to a man as he grasps this truth?

This is the result of turning to God, the Eternal Presence in History? Peace; the peace that floweth like a river, the Peace of God which passeth understanding, peace that the world can neither give nor take away. Hope; like an anchor of the soul sure and steadfast and that entereth in within the veil, a hope that lifts the soul buoyant above despair. Wisdom; which is the principal thing in all getting that makes possible an ideal government among men, and companionship; co-laborers with the Almighty, bringing courage and fellowship as the man knows his God through the sharing of life with him. Peace, Hope, Wisdom, Companionship, a strand of four-ply strength whereby a man or a nation may bind earth to heaven, and the human to the divine, and the mortal to the eternal.

Eternal and Unchangeable

Yes, let us all turn to the God who in the beginning laid the foundations of the earth. To him who shall fold up the mountains and the plains and the heavens themselves as a garment. To him who shall remain when everything that we now behold shall perish. To him whose years shall not fail. It does not seem possible to us that the earth shall ever be changed like that. It does not seem possible that any power can fold up this order of things and calmly lay it away like a garment. Yet the time will come when the Lord of all the earth shall bring to an end the present material order. The history of humanity shall all be acted out. The play shall come to an end. The actors shall all vanish from earth's stage. The last tragedy shall be performed. The last tear shall be shed. The last sigh breathed on earth. And God shall say "enough." Then like a vesture shall be fold up all these things, and they shall be changed. Stupendous change! It says they shall perish. They shall not be as they now are. They shall be changed.

When that change takes place what will remain of all that is worth anything? God will remain; the same as ever, for his years shall not fail. From everlasting to everlasting he is God. The shocks of terrible events in man's history affect him like a Father, but have no effect on his eternity. Men shall perish, mountains be removed, stars burnt out, the last city of greatness shall be the abode of desolation, and then the globe shall be dissolved perhaps by the chemical combination of the powerful explosives which actually reside within it; but God shall remain unchanged, eternal love, eternal Fatherhood, eternal life.

Immortal Companionship

Whatever is divine in man, shall also remain with God. Physical sense and fleshly tastes shall not remain. They shall perish. Only the divine as we call it, and as it shall be possible when the earth and heaven are passed away. Character, love, the results of self-denial, and purity and truth and service, these shall remain when all else is swept away, perished, changed. God will not inherit eternity alone. With him forever shall exist the spirits of the just made perfect, the martyrs who gave their lives for his name's sake, the little children who for ages have gone out of this world into his presence, all the souls that have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. There are more beings in the spiritual world the other side of death than in this. Heaven is not a lonely place. Ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands in that realm of unclouded beauty fall upon their faces and cry "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty! Heaven and earth are full of thy glory!" As God co-operated with man in the labor of redeeming the earth, so, after the earth history has all been written and everything has perished of a material order, then in the spiritual kingdom God shall, in fellowship with man, continue to be man's best friend.

What, then, is better for us as individuals and as a nation than to turn to God and live and move in him? Are we perplexed, annoyed, disheartened, terrified, fearful of the future. God has not departed out of our lives, nor out of human history. He is the same, and his years know no end. He is a Father, and a father loves his children. He is a Saviour, and he will care for his own.

He is Wisdom

and he is ready to share with us. He is Immanuel, God with us, and though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, he is there with us. There is no crisis so serious, no calamity so terrible, that the Divine is unable to face with tranquillity and easy power. What has our nation to fear now or any time if it will only accept the help of God? He with us is equal to all emergencies. Let us not forget it is God working with humanity that shall be the salvation of the world. Not God alone, not man alone, but God with man. It is his way. We cannot question its eternal wisdom. It is absolutely certain that if the nation ignores God in its affairs as a government, if it trusts to its own political sagacity and refuses to go to him in prayer for guidance, he will not step in and by his own superhuman might bring order out of confusion, restore good times, supply idle men with work at reasonable wages, and begin a reign of peace, happiness, content and brotherly good-will without the action of men. And it is just as certain also that if men, if the nation, shall turn to him with all their hearts and ask for wisdom and love to be taught by him, then God with man shall give us a government where liberty, and peace, and plenty, and good-will, and kindness, and love shall reign supreme. This is as certain to follow as the action of any scientific fact in obedience to eternal laws of matter. The results of action in the spiritual world are just as sure and fixed as results in the physical kingdom. If we obey the conditions, we shall get results just as much in one world of action as in the other.

The Present Need

What we need most of all, therefore, is the pouring out of the Holy Spirit of God upon our nation, that it may, in the light of that great revealing truth, turn unto the Almighty, ask forgiveness for its sins and do his will. What the nation needs is a powerful conviction of its need of God. Congress needs it. The business men of the country need it. The colleges and schools need it. The churches need it. The entire structure of society needs the purifying, uplifting, redeeming, regenerating incoming of the God who laid the foundations of the earth, whose presence in human history is an eternal fact, whose power to help has been witnessed at many turning points in the lives of men and nations. Let us cry aloud and spare not. Let us prepare our hearts for the indwelling of the Spirit of God. Let us spend much time in prayer that the baptism of another Pentecost may rest on the world in this age, as when it ushered in the triumph of the Cross over the pagan. Let us turn unto the Lord and he will have mercy upon us and to our God and he will abundantly pardon. And the world shall tremble at the coming of the Spirit of Peace and Power who shall reveal to us the things of God, and bring the nation out of darkness into light and out of the bondage of self into the liberty of the children of God. "God shall bless us and all the ends of the earth shall fear him." "For this God is our God. He will be our guide even unto death."

Answers to Question of the Week

Is a cook, butler, manager, or other employee, who is fairly paid for his services, justified in accepting gifts from tradesmen with whom he deals, though these may not be given as "commissions?"

A Pernicious Habit

The habit of making such gifts is becoming most pernicious. In many places one cannot hope for good service without it. Thus, the rich man, who need not economize, can have every order filled with promptness and courtesy, while the poor man must wait the time and pleasure of the well-paid employee, and then receive half-hearted, poor service.

MRS. J. C. R.

Follow the Bible Rule

If such gifts are intended to secure his influence with his employer in the giver's behalf, then to accept would be simply selling himself and debasing his manhood. The Word says: "And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous" (Ex. 23: 8).

GABRIELLA T. STICKNEY.

Better not Receive such Gifts

No doubt it is possible for a cook, butler, manager, or other employee, to receive an occasional present from tradesmen which is not intended either as a bribe or commission; but he who does so lays himself liable to suspicion: and if trouble comes, he who has taken gifts would find it very hard to establish his innocence; while one who had the stability to resist such temptation, could easily clear himself of the least suspicion of guilt by proving that he never, under any circumstances, received a gift from tradesmen. The latter way would be the simplest—the best, and always above distrust. It is the way a strictly honest Christian should prefer.

MARY SPAULDING HATCH.

Gifts Have a Demoralizing Influence

One in the employ of others has no right to accept gifts for doing his duty. A tradesman who gives an employee gifts for bringing him custom, must get his pay in some way for said gifts. It is not likely that the tradesman will do this at his own cost. It does not cost the cook or butler anything, so it must come from the employer's pocket. Let all such dealings be square, honest and above board, understood by each party concerned; and if any gifts be made, let them be mutually agreed upon.

S. G.

"Tips" and Gifts Not Honorable

The question of true honesty is an important one, yet we find it laid aside by many, as of little consequence. A Scotch lyricist has said: "An honest man's the noblest work of God." The man who holds any such position in the household as cook, butler, or manager, is not strictly honest to his master, if he does not buy at the cheapest and most desirable market, not seeking a tradesman whose prices are so high as to enable him to present gifts, popularly known as "tips."

R. L. BURNS.

They are Simply Bribes

The giver's purpose is plain. Whatever the method, the purpose is to buy the buyer. Such an act casts a suspicion on rectitude. It is of most doubtful propriety. In accepting the gift you are accepting a full or partial payment of the price of your favor. No court, either civil or ecclesiastical, could completely absolve you from guilt. The only way to accept the gift, would be through and with the approval of your employer. Otherwise your acceptance would not admit of justification.

C. H. B.

Gifts that Promote Good-Will

Readers of Mark Twain will recall his rather humorous mention of the custom, which existed in a certain section of the South, of expecting, or asking for, a gift with every purchase. This custom was designated by the term "Lagniappe," which was understood to mean, "The equivalent of the thirteenth roll in a baker's dozen." While it would probably be burdensome to dealers to be compelled by custom to offer a gift with every purchase, still the occasional act would be easy, and likely to promote the good-will of the buyer. Where such an occasional gift is offered, I would suggest that the employee refer the matter to his employer, and if no objection is offered, he would be fully justified in accepting it. It is an established custom with many dealers, when receiving a bill, to accompany such receipt with a small gift; others may offer a gift when receiving an order; and in either case, the cook, butler, manager, or other employee need not hesitate to accept it, treating it simply as an expression of the dealer's good-will and appreciation.

ERNEST SMEDLEY.

Friendly Gifts Approved

He is perfectly justified in accepting an occasional gift from tradesmen with whom he deals, provided he never allows himself to be influenced thereby to lose sight of his employer's best interests when making purchases. These gifts will naturally tend to engender a feeling of friendly regard between tradesman and employee, which will be of advantage to all concerned. The employee will be a steady trader at the house where he is well used, and the tradesman, having a regular customer, will seek to give him only the best goods. The employee must, however, deal with those who favor him only so long as he can do as well at their establishments as he can elsewhere. His employer's interests must always be paramount. The question of the amount of pay allowed the employee by his employer has no bearing on the case. The entire matter rests in the integrity of the employee.

A. L. VERMILYEA.

Miscellaneous Questions

C., Toledo, Ill. Are we to understand from the Bible that there will be a period of a thousand years of peace at the close of this dispensation? If so, how will it be brought about, in the face of the preparations that the nations are making for war?

The Bible certainly assures us that the millennium will come (See Isa. 11; Zech. 14; Rev. 20 and other passages). Opinion is divided as to the way in which it will come. Some scholars believe that it will be brought about by the personal coming of Christ. Others believe that the propagation of Christianity will go forward until the whole world is converted, and that Christ's spirit will rule the world, and not that his reign will be a personal one. In either case the preparations for war need not be an obstacle. The nations are preparing for emergencies that they hope will never rise. Even Russia tried to call a halt by the Peace Conference at the Hague.

MacG., Davenport, Ia. Who named "Uncle Sam"? The name, it is said, originated in Troy, N. Y., during the war of 1812. An army contractor, whose name was Elbert Anderson, was laying in a supply of provisions, which were examined by a local official known in the town as Uncle Sam. He marked each case E. A.—U. S. "Elbert Anderson—United States." Some one seeing the initials, asked what they stood for, and a wag responded, "Elbert Anderson—Uncle Sam." The story spread, and soon U. S. came to mean for everyone, "Uncle Sam."

S. S., Los Angeles, Calif. I am employed in an office, and I want to know whether, on meeting my employer on the street, I should be the first to salute, or if I should wait for him to salute me?

The rule in the Army and Navy is that he of lesser rank should first salute his superior. On the ground, we should say, that it is certainly your place to be the first to say "Good morning" or to offer salutation. But in this matter you must use discretion, so that you do not appear to be forcing your attention on your employer. When a man and woman meet, it is the woman's privilege to bow or speak first, and there may often be circumstances when a similar privilege should be accorded to the employer. If good manners are entirely a matter of rules and regulations, there would be no excuse for any one to be a clown or to blunder over these little niceties of behavior; but since they are not, there is all the more chance for you to exhibit good breeding by doing the right thing at the right moment.

S. G., Vicksburg, Miss. In what sense are we to understand the quotation from the Psalms applied to Christ in John 2:17, "The Zeal of thine house hath eaten me up?"

It simply implies an intensity of zeal that absorbed him. His disciples were astonished at their Teacher's conduct. He was usually so gentle and inoffensive that they were amazed at this sudden ebullition of indignation. They could scarcely recognize Jesus as he took the scourge and drove the traders out of the temple. It was so vigorous a thing to do that it probably seemed to them inconsistent with his character. When, however, they remembered the words quoted, they understood how his whole soul was stirred when he saw the building consecrated to his Father used as a common market.

C., Winchester, Mass. Is it not wrong for young people to whisper in church during service, to the disturbance or annoyance of others and if so, ought they to take offence if reproved?

It is wrong, certainly, to whisper in church such a way that people sitting nearby are annoyed. A persistent whisperer is a nuisance, who ought to be ejected as a disturber. There are occasions, however, as every one will acknowledge, when it may be pardonable to whisper, as when a mother or father is speaking to a child. For adults to indulge in the habit is inexcusable.

A. S., Harlem, N. Y. I have a cat with a pure white tail. Is this a curiosity?

An absolutely white tail is so seldom found on a cat, that your puss may certainly be considered a curiosity.

Graduate, New York City. Which was the first college paper to be started in America? To the best of our knowledge, the Gazette, published at Dartmouth College in 1800, was the first college paper.

rs. S. B. W., Pine Grove, N. Y. Where in the Bible is it stated that the years of man have been shortened to three score years and ten? See Psalm 90:10.

We have received an interesting communication from a correspondent in regard to the time when the typewriter was invented; one of our readers, in a reply published a few weeks ago on this page, having given the year 1873. It seems that the inventor of the typewriter was Mr. Thomas Hall, who was the first to build and exhibit one of these writing machines. His earliest model was completed in 1866, and among those who took an interest in this device, in which most business men of the day could see no practical use, was Henry Ward Beecher. Our correspondent has sent for our inspection a letter written by the first typewriter operator and expert, which is dated 1867.

A Pioneer School for Jewish Maidens

IN the very heart of the Jewish district of New York City a school for Jewish girls has been established, which is of unusual interest for this reason—that it is the first of its kind. It is a Sewing School, and here every branch of needlework is taught, from elementary stitches to the most elaborate and beautiful embroidery. The school hours are from 3.30 to 6 o'clock, and here the pretty Jewish maidens congregate, after their regular school work is finished for the day. They attend the classes every day of the week, except on Fridays, when their exacting household duties—each one is an orthodox Jewess—demand of them those preparations for their Sabbath which makes the home of the Jew all over the world so attractive and lovable. The Jewish girls are extremely clever with the needle, and it is doubtful whether any other race can excel them in this branch of domestic science. Each day, some three or four hundred girls meet for instruction in this womanly occupation in the big hall, which has been procured for their use by the founder and superintendent, Mr. Adolph Benjamin. The girls range in age from seven to fourteen years. At the end of each day's work a short address is delivered on religious topics, the lecture on Saturday afternoons being generally delivered by some prominent Jewish minister.

5,000,000 People May Sign the Pledge

THE National Temperance Organization, after conferring with representative men and women of the various religious and temperance organizations in Great Britain and the United States, and in conjunction with these bodies, has planned to inaugurate, simultaneously, in all the leading cities and towns of the English-speaking world, a Twentieth Century Temperance Pledge Signing Campaign, on Sunday, November 23d, 1902, the day designated by United Christendom as Temperance Sunday.

It is hoped that something like 5,000,000 persons will be induced to sign the pledge, and there is no doubt the plans have been very carefully laid, both here and abroad, by the Rev. Hervey Wood, Field Secretary of the Society.

All the initial work has been done by the central committee. Large cities and towns have been communicated with. Circular letters, outlining the plan and calling for co-operation, are being sent to ministers and churches of all denominations, to Sunday School superintendents and teachers, and to temperance organizations.

The central committee believe that each city, town and community should determine how the work should be carried forward there by a local committee.

The crusade is in capable hands; we wish it a full measure of success.

The central committee will furnish to all parties co-operating in the movement, pledges for circulation and pledge books with blanks, so a complete record may be had of the work done in each locality, and by each church. Address Rev. Hervey Wood, Field Secretary, Twentieth Century Crusade, office, 3 West Eighteenth street, New York City.

America's Pantheon

Our "Hall of Fame" on University Heights, New York, is unique in the Pantheons of nations. No mythical gods and goddesses, no kings, no queens, none whose titles came with birth, inhabit it; its dwellers won place by their own might. In no other age of the world and no other country could such a temple as this be raised. The soldier does not outclass the missionary, the explorer, the physician, the inventor, the editor, author, artist: The arts of peace are magnified. To read our beautiful premium book, the Hall of Fame, which gives a full account of the institution, and sketches and portraits of those whose names are inscribed therein, is to read the history of our country and its wonderful development; for all this is shown in brief in the life stories of the men who have made us great in industry, art and science as well as war. This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, only $2.

The Bowery Mission Revival

THE great crowd of men thronging the hall on the first night of the recent special services at the Bowery Mission (some account of which has already been given), had reason to be impressed. It was the anniversary of one of the boys—the celebration of the day when he first found Christ. On such occasions our workers and converts are usually present in full force. On this particular Sunday evening they were in their places, every one more earnest through remembrance of the Lord's Supper partaken the night before, and because of the fact that this was the first night of a special effort to lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of the Redeemer's kingdom in this section of the great city. No ordinary man took the leading part in the meeting. Among all the pitiful tragedies recounted here, the story he told will always have a prominent place. Twelve months ago he was a poor, desolate, penniless tramp; to-day he is holding a position of trust in one of the leading business houses in the city. Born in comfort, reared in a Christian home in the old country, he secured a college education, and won a degree. Then drink, dissipation, loss of character, flight to this country; fresh dissipation, tramping the Bowery, and almost death: entrance into the mission on what he feared would be his last night on earth; with that new hope, new life, a struggle upward with friends to help him, made concluding chapters in the story he told. He stood as a living witness of God's faithfulness to bless the work at the old Lighthouse on the Bowery.

It was in keeping that the first of these special meetings, at which some of the most distinguished men in our city were to speak, should be led by a typical convert of the mission. The notable workers who came night by night, brought wonderful messages, and delivered them with extraordinary power. The first to speak was the Rev. F. H. Jacobs, who has aided us before. "Christ, the door," was his text. Rev. Mr. Bagnell, the brilliant young pastor of the Metropolitan Temple, followed, and spoke of the virile Gospel of Jesus Christ, a Gospel needed to help us in the great struggles of life. Rev. Dr. MacArthur's text was "Wilt thou be made whole?" Taking in at a glance the splendid possibilities wrapped up in the crowd of men he was addressing, he passionately pleaded with them to assert their rights and claim their privileges of true manhood. Rev. P. S. Henson, D.D., gave a discourse on Dives and Lazarus. Rev. J. H. Elliott, D.D., moved the men as they have been rarely stirred by a talk on "God's love." Rev. I. P. Withington spoke on "God—the soul, reason, and the will."

In nightly succession the following speakers addressed the meeting: Miss Gaering on "Is life worth living?" Major Fred. Gardner on "Christ the wonderful Counsellor," Rev. E. D. Bailey on the healing of the lame man; Rev. F. H. Jacobs gave a stereopticon service. One of the most remarkable services was that in which the Rev. James H. Darlington, D.D., of Christ's Protestant Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, appeared. Dr. Darlington read a portion of the evening prayers of the Episcopal service, and every one present was surprised at the hearty responses that came from the congregation. He afterwards delivered a thrilling and eloquent address on the subject, "Formation and reformation."

As to the results of these special services, in which some of the ablest ministers and workers in the city helped us, the Judgment Day will alone reveal them. Never in its history has the Bowery had such stirring appeals made. Never has the Gospel of Jesus Christ been preached in a more winning and faithful manner. Every evening of that week and every evening since, a large number of men have publicly declared their determination to begin a Christian life. A watchful committee has waited at the door to see that not a man went out into the streets without having a word said to him; no wanderer of the night, no mother's wayward boy, no unfortunate lad longing for help and counsel was overlooked.

In the name of all our workers, and in the name of the desolate ones who will be cheered and helped by such goodness, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are thanked for evidences received at the office of the paper, that our friendless, homeless men and boys are being lovingly remembered by God's children, who are sending money to help us make their Thanksgiving and Christmas glad.

Many Little Lamps of Light

The Speaking Oak seems a strange title for a book, but, says Rev. Dr. Iglehart, the author, "The oak speaks. It suggests to the farmer the number of rails or cords of wood he can cut from it. It tells the lumberman the quantity of timber it can furnish for houses. It reminds the flock of sheep and herd of cattle of its grateful shade not only does the oak talk; all trees and things and events have a tongue and speak an eloquent language. . . . I have introduced stories of men and things as interpreters of moral truth and as expressions of the Divine voice." Who would not love to read beautiful stories that uplift while they entertain. These stories are like 301 brilliant little lamps lighting life's way; send them to illuminate your friends' Christmas, or set them in your own dwelling. Only $2 secures this delightful volume, crammed with exquisite narratives and beautiful illustrations, together with one year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

MADE A TURN OVER. Any One Can Do It.

A principal in a public school in Ohio had a food experience that will be familiar to many school teachers.

"The hard work of the school room was wearing that I was completely worn out could barely walk home at night, and at times I was so nervous that it was with difficulty I ate or slept. I attributed my ing health to improper food, and felt that would be necessary to quit my profession get some food that would sustain my nerves."

Fortunately enough at this juncture I covered Grape-Nuts and am very grateful I did. After using the food for a month I decidedly better and like a new man re-rected from the grave. The sluggish feel headache and nervous spells have all left and I feel young and active.

I can better concentrate my mind upon work because my nerves have been strengthened and my health and energy has returned and I take interest in my work which seemed a burden.

I use Grape-Nuts every day because it is the best food for my system, has restored health and I am correspondingly grateful. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

QUEER"

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV.
C. H.
YATMAN

PSALM XXI.

The King's Psalm

1. The king shall joy in thy strength, O Lord; and in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice!

2. Thou hast given him his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips. Selah.

"A CROWN OF PURE GOLD"

3. For thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness; thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head.

Not King David's alone, but every one who has been made king and priest unto God. We are not to be dealt with as common folk, but as befits our station of royalty.

Here we are to rule our spirits aright and govern our tempers and legislate in equity for our passions and will.

Later we will be crowned for a wider sway and more extended kingdom.

Verse three of this Psalm is kingly in the highest degree. So is verse seven.

PSALM XXII.

The Affliction Psalm

1. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Why art thou so far from helping me?

14. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint; my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels.

"MY GOD! MY GOD!"

15. My strength is dried up like a pottersherd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws; and thou hast brought me into the dust of death.

16. For dogs have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me; they pierced my hands and my feet.

Here is a Psalm that has in it touches of Gethsemane and Calvary. It is the 53d of Isaiah over again, and the pain of Hebrews 12. Here you find the experience of folk who go through the fire, and pass under the floods, but the fire only refines and the waters only wash away our stains. "He who suffers most has most to give."

Thousands could find help here if they would go in the furnace. Every blessing has its price.

PSALM XXIII.

The Shepherd's Psalm

1. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.

2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters.

"IN GREEN PASTURES"

3. He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.

This might be called "The Childhood Psalm," for its sweetness is alike good to first and second childhood.

To fully understand it, the Spirit also gave Ezekiel 34, and that, with the "Shepherd's Chapter," John 10, makes known the full meaning of the "Ninety and Nine," one of the two great parables of Christ.

All thirty-two are great, but Luke 15 is matchless.

No want, no fear, and all fullness by Him, who is the Great Shepherd.

PSALM XXIV.

King of Glory's Psalm

7. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

8. Who is this King of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle.

THE OPENED GATES

Earthly kings and kingdoms become small here.

All crowns melt into one for The King.

The world and all in it are His.

Out of it He will take His own, and up they will go, who "have clean hands and a pure heart."

Then the everlasting gates of the Eternal City will lift to let Him in.

The Lord of hosts is the King of glory, and with Him we "shall sweep through the gates, washed in the blood of the Lamb."

NEW COFFEE.

For the U. S. Army.

Some soldiers are badly affected by coffee drinking. The Hospital Steward in one of the Army Posts in the West, says:—"Though in the medical service of the Army, I suffered agony for two years from a case of chronic gastric indigestion, and now that I am free from all the tortures attendant upon it, I attribute it to the good effects of Postum Food Coffee, both as a food and as a beverage. I used medicinal and mechanical means to relieve myself during those two years and even though I had left off the use of coffee, I did not find myself in any measure free until I had commenced using Postum.

Being in charge of a detachment of the Hospital Corps, U. S. A., I, of course, had supervision of the mess, and by degrees I have initiated into using Postum, every member of the mess, some of whom were formerly very loud in their denunciation of anything 'manufactured.' And, going still further, I have supplied it to our patients in lieu of coffee; none have found fault, while many have praised it highly, and when returned to duty, have continued the use of it when it was possible, for a soldier has an extremely hard time in trying to choose his own food.

For the past eight months, not a grain of coffee has been used in this Hospital, and thanks to a cook who prepares Postum just right—there is a brilliant prospect of coffee taking a permanent seat in the back-ground.

One who has passed through the horrors of indigestion as I have, shudders as he looks back upon his sufferings and when cognizant of the cause, will shun coffee as he would a rattle snake." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Pennsylvania Railroad's Winter Excursion Route Book.

In pursuance of its annual custom, the Passenger Department of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has just issued an attractive and comprehensive book descriptive of the leading Winter resorts of the East and South, and giving the rates and various routes and combinations of routes of travel. Like all the publications of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, this "Winter Excursion Book" is a model of typographical and clerical work. It is bound in a handsome and artistic cover in colors, and contains much valuable information for Winter tourists and travelers in general. It can be had free of charge at the principal ticket offices of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, or will be sent postpaid upon application to Geo. W. DIVINE WARFARE

Gideon an Obedient Instrument of Deliverance

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

ONE who is to be a deliverer of men must know how to bear witness for God in his own home. When God appointed Gideon to deliver his people (Judges 6: 7-40) he gave him this duty, too, and Gideon was not left at a loss to know how. God commanded him to take his father's bullock of seven years, to throw down his father's idolatrous altar, to build in its place an altar unto the Lord and to offer the bullock for a burnt-offering upon the wood of the Asherah or grove, which he should cut down. No easy task. Gideon feared his father's wrath and that of the men of the city to do it by day; but, with the men of his father's house who were ready with him to bear witness for God, he did it by night. And when the men of the city awoke in the morning, their favorite shrine was destroyed, and an altar of the Lord with the smoking sacrifice upon it met their gaze. They were angry. Who had done it? None but Gideon; and they sought to slay the witness of the Lord. But God is responsible for all he calls his witnesses to do; the hearts of all men are in his hands: the very Father whose wrath Gideon feared, stood by his son, and said, "Will ye plead for Baal? or will ye save him? if he be a god let him plead for himself, because one hath broken down his altar."

Just when the Lord arises, the enemy is always the most active. The enemies of Israel combined; Midianites, Amalekites, and the children of the East (perhaps some tribes of the Arabians) "assembled themselves together and pitched in the valley of Jezreel." But the Spirit of the Lord clothed himself with Gideon (Judges 6: 34, R. V., marg.), and he blew a trumpet, and Abiezer (which had sought his life) was gathered after him. Then all Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali came up to meet him. But again this chosen man sought to make sure of God. He asked for a miracle by way of sign, and then for a second, and God was not displeased. He loves to have his servants make fully sure of him before anything or everything which they undertake. God answered him, and then put him to the proof. This is always God's way. If we prove God, we put ourselves into the position in which he may honor us by putting us to the proof.

When God revealed himself to Joshua as Commander-in-Chief of the armies of Israel, he had to learn that the plan of campaign was in no way in his hands; he had not to reason whether it were likely to answer or not; he had simply to obey, and to leave the consequences to him who made himself responsible. Gideon had to do the same. This is the lesson which so many of us are so slow in learning. God told Gideon that his forces were too numerous. "The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hand, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, mine own hand hath saved me." Then he commanded that all the fearful and afraid, the very men who would boast themselves if they gained the victory, were those who at heart were cowards. Twenty-two thousand were of this class and returned home. Ten thousand, with the living God remained. "These are too many" was the next order, and the remaining ten thousand must be submitted to a test that they might be put to the proof.

Those few men who, when in their thirst, they were brought down to the waters, took only a little water in their hand and drank just enough to quench their thirst, but not enough for thorough satisfaction, were set apart; they were but three hundred. The remainder went down upon their knees, put their mouths into the water, and drank to their hearts' content. The three hundred who had shown self-restraint were chosen. "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you." Gideon believed, and therefore feared nothing; he had feared whether indeed God would use such as he, but he had no fear that once God undertook, there could be any failure.

Cornish Pianos & Organs

A CURE FOR THE WORLD'S WOE

How the Revelation of God as a Friend and Benefactor Affects the World's Life

ONE of the greatest of modern preachers declared that the first of the ten commandments was superfluous in our time. The condition of the world, he said, had sunk below the sin which that commandment was designed to prevent. "Men in our time are in no danger of having other gods beside Jehovah; their supreme shame is that they have no God at all." Even of those who do recognize him, many show such recognition only in appealing to him for help and deliverance in times of trouble or danger, so that, as Fichte said, they had an impression that there was no necessity for a God, except that he might look after our interests. A very different conception of him is that of the Jewish prophet: "A just God and a Saviour. Look unto me and be ye saved. Unto me every knee shall bow." It was the conception of a God personally ruling over the world; a God whom it was supreme folly to ignore; a God against whom men rebelled only to their own discomfort. About eighty generations have lived and died since that idea of God was promulgated, and still it is not accepted by more than a comparatively small minority of the human race. Apparently the day is still far distant when the prophecy that every knee will bow to him is fulfilled; but that it is measurably nearer than ever before in the world's history is evident. There never was a time when so many men as now, in all climes, sincerely worshiped him; but the end is not yet.

Yet this conception of God is so comforting, so helpful, that one would have expected it to be gladly adopted as soon as it was announced. Very few men, even among those who boast of being "self-made," are satisfied with themselves. The vast majority are conscious of faults and defects of character, and are aware that they have not attained even to their own low ideals. They know that they need help, yet they blindly or perversely put away from them the help that is offered. If we can imagine a Being so infinite in majesty as the Creator of the universe grieving, surely he must grieve at the conduct of the human race. One has often seen a spoiled child setting his will against the will of a kind and indulgent father. It is a sad spectacle, for the father would be glad to do the thing the child desires, if he was not sure that it would be injurious to the child himself. The story is told of a child delighted with the beauty of a wasp, insisting on clutching it. The boy kicked and struggled to get it, and was prevented only by the father's superior strength. Sometimes God permits his child to grasp the wasp, in the hope that he may learn in future to trust and obey him. It is a great thing, a most momentous idea to know authoritatively that God loves us. It changes the attitude of all his laws. They are not the capricious, despotic commands of an autocrat, but the beneficent rules of a Being, who, loving us, would save us from wrecking our lives.

This is a glorious message for missionaries to carry to heathen lands. It puts away all the misconceptions of God; it shows the absurdity of the self-torture which is endured in the hope of conciliating him; and even in civilized lands, the necessity of beseeching dead saints to intercede with him. He loves men already, even those who are rebelling against him, and would gladly welcome a change of attitude toward him. He is no enemy, no oppressor, but the kind, loving Father, who broods over his creatures and desires to make them happy. That they can be happy in sin he knows to be impossible, and, sooner or later, this obvious fact must reach the hearts of all men. The sure promise that every knee shall yet bow to him is an inspiration to evangelistic effort. It is a promise of victory to every soldier under the banner of the Cross. He may not see it; but he knows that he is contributing to its fulfillment.

WHEN I SAY TO YOU

that Clapp's Ideal Steel Range is 40 to 100 per cent. better in quality than any other range, and that it will positively save 25 per cent. to 50 per cent. in fuel over the old style Cast-Iron Cook-stove or range. I don't ask you to accept these statements on my say-so. I want you to have every opportunity to prove them to your satisfaction. Hence my liberal offer to ship my range anywhere and if not perfectly satisfactory to you, I pay freight both ways without one cent of expense to you.

ON SIX MONTHS TRIAL

ALL PEOPLE EXPRESS SURPRISE

upon receipt of my range, and ask at once how it is that I can sell such a high grade range at $10 to $20 less than others charge for inferior goods. The economy and saving in fuel is so marked that they are continuously sending me complimentary letters. There is more than one good reason for all this Range perfection and wonderful economy. My superior location on Lake Erie, where coal, iron, freights, skilled labor, and all steel range materials are cheapest and best, enables me, in one of the largest and best equipped Steel Range factories in the world, to turn out a range that is superior to others in all respects, at the lowest possible price.

With ranges made in quantities and no expense for agents, traveling-salesmen and peddlers, you are offered an opportunity to buy direct at factory prices. No middleman's profits, and the Range the "top notch" of perfection.

SENT FREE—My handsome 32-page book full of illustrations of my Range for city, town, or country use. This book gives in detail more facts about the merits and construction of Steel Ranges, than any other book ever published. If you are interested, a postal will bring it. It's valuable and worth seeing. Send for it.

DON'T BE MISLED and buy a heater from anyone before first finding out the weight and height. Pictures of Oak Heaters look very much alike but the weight and height indicate the true value. This is important, for weight denotes the quality of a stove and height adds to its attractiveness, therefore it is to your interest to get the heaviest and highest heater for your money that you can.

WE SELL 5 SIZES of Heaters as enumerated above, all made and finished like the illustration, with fire-resisting castings of special mixed pig iron, solid one-piece air-tight sunk bottom ash pit, large ash pan, ash-pit door, air tight screw draft, heavy corrugated cast iron fire-pot, large handsome fire-pot ring cemented and bolted to top and fire-pot stretched over cast flanges making the drum air tight, mounted with 18 gauge smooth steel and heavy nee-see-out castings, fitted with nickel plated swing top ring, nickel door latch, hinge pins and knobs, 3 nickel foot rails, nickel register in ash-pit door, nickel name plate and handsome spun brass urn. Important features are cooking lids under swing top, check damper in pipe collar and feed door, and shake and draw center grate for coal and wood.

OUR "FAULTLESS" HEATER AT $9.30 we recommend for all around use, because experience has taught us that it is the ideal size for a heating stove. It weighs 210 pounds, is 53 inches high, has a 16-inch fire pot, occupies 29 x 32 1/2 inches floor space, and takes 6 inch pipe.

PRICES ARE FOR THE HEATERS FINELY BLACKED AND POLISHED ON BOARD CARS IN CHICAGO.

SEND US $1.00 deposit, state heater wanted, and we will send it to you by freight subject to examination, you to pay the agent the balance due and freight charges, after you have examined it and convinced yourself that it is the heaviest, highest, handsomest and best Oak Heater you ever saw or heard of for anywhere near our price. COLLEGE GIRL CALENDAR

The immense popularity of Our Art Calendar painted for LESLIE'S MONTHLY last year by MISS MAUD STUMM, the well-known American water colorist, has led us to employ her extraordinary talent upon a calendar for 1903, picturing the American College Girl. Beautifully lithographed in twelve colors upon three sheets of heavy pebble plate paper, tied with silk ribbon, are the graceful figures of girls dressed in the colors of the great colleges. On each sheet is the appropriate college seal and the college yell. The whole carries out the complete college idea. Size 10 inches by 12 3-4 inches.

Remember, if you mention The Christian Herald the Beautiful American College Girl Calendar for 1903, and the November and December issues are given Free, all charges prepaid by us, with each $1.⁰⁰ subscription to FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY for 1903—that is, fourteen numbers and Calendar postpaid,

Health, Clear Skin and a Good Figure

I do not THINK I can give you these priceless gifts—I KNOW. I have given them to 5,000 women by teaching the simple laws of Nature. Give me 15 minutes of your time each day and I will give you not only freedom from suffering, but make your life a joy, your work a pleasure, and your pleasure perfect. I will give you individually exactly what you need to build up, fill out or reduce your figure to graceful, symmetrical proportions and secure for you a graceful carriage, a good poise—mental, moral, vital—perfect self-possession, clear brain, quick perception, winning manner. These are the gifts of perfect health and perfect knowledge of yourself.

Fifteen minutes a day is no tax on any person's time or patience, and for it you may have bounding life in your veins, a clear skin, bright eyes, happiness. I know woman's needs and troubles through 12 years' experience in helping them. I have yet to find one whom I cannot benefit. I undertook my work by mail because I succeeded so well in personal work, and the benefits which my pupils have received have been more and greater than I even dared to hope.

The following extracts are from letters from my pupils on my desk as I write:

"Everybody notices the difference in my complexion. It has lost that yellow color almost entirely."
"I wish that every nervous teacher could know of your work."
"The hollows in my neck are filling up nicely."
"I have not had a cold this fall as yet: something unusual for me."
"I feel so good, so light, so happy from morning till night."
"My catarrh is better than it has been for three years."
"All signs of female weaknesses have disappeared."
"Now I can walk; before I used to get out of breath if I walked just a short distance."
"My double chin has decreased, and the flesh on my face looks firmer and the skin clearer."
"My digestion is better than it has been for years."
"My weight has decreased four pounds since I was weighed ten days ago."
"I am well pleased with the result of my week's work, as I have lost five pounds."
"My throat exercises are helping my throat to my great delight."
"I was weighed yesterday, and find I have gained about nine pounds, which is more than I dared hope for in so short a time."
"I have gained eight pounds in flesh, but eight hundred times that amount in feeling."
"I never felt better in my life."
"Before I began your exercises you could have counted every rib in my body. Now they are well covered—my flesh is firm, my nerves steady and my muscles in fine condition, and I have had neither colds in my head, nor indigestion, though I was very subject to both. I have gained eight pounds."
Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, D.D., L.L.D., writes me: "Your thorough preparation for your work and your high aim must surely give you a worthy success."

Remember, my work is physical culture—not mere muscular exercise. You want something which reaches causes; you want something for your own special need. Men cannot do this work for women. They do not understand our conditions nor limitations. My exercises cultivate the distinguished carriage and bearing which at once bespeaks culture and refinement. Write and tell me your needs, and for ten cents in stamps to cover the mere expense of paper and postage, I shall be pleased to send you an instructive and interesting booklet, letters from my pupils, and a card for your dressing-table showing the correct lines of the woman's figure in poise and movement. Yours for a body expressing perfect health, perfect grace, and perfect womanhood.

DOUKHOBORS MOBILIZING AT YORKTON

ZIBROFF, THE FANATIC, AND HIS WIFE

THE PILGRIMAGE OF THE DOUKHOBORS

THE pilgrimage of the Doukhobors has come, for the present at least, to an extraordinary end. The five hundred peasants marching on Winnipeg were met by a body of mounted police. A train had been provided to carry them back to their homes, near Yorkton, Assiniboia. They were invited to enter, but refused to listen to any argument. They were going "to seek Jesus"; they would not return to their villages.

Then occurred one of the most exciting episodes in the history of the Northwest. The whole body of fanatics was surrounded and forcibly entrained. At the time the thermometer was standing at ten degrees below zero, and during the struggle a terrible blizzard sprang up.

The Doukhobors refused to fight, but they resisted desperately. They encircled each other with their arms, forming a solid mass of squirming humanity that might have been linked together with bands of steel. For over an hour, in the midst of the raging snowstorm, the frantic fight continued; all the while the Doukhobors gave voice to their wild chant, and the women, who looked on, shouted encouragement to their husbands.

The Russians, shouting, struggling, kicking, resisting by every means but blows, were overcome, one by one, or in groups, and carried bodily into the dark, cold coaches, where they were herded like cattle. In this strange prison they sang and prayed, and asked Divine assistance to turn the hearts of their captors.

To understand the situation, it is necessary to recall the history of these people. Originally their homes were in the Caucasian Mountains, in Russia. They were known as a peaceable people, kindly in disposition, clean in their habits, industrious, but exceedingly stubborn in following the dictates of their conscience. Condemning war, they refused to serve in the army, and this led to their being subjected to terrible persecution. So dreadful was the cruelty to which they were exposed, that Count Tolstoi and other philanthropists, chiefly among the Quakers of England and America, entered into negotiations to arrange for the migration of the whole sect to Canada. Tolstoi devoted the entire proceeds of his novel, The Resurrection, to this purpose, and the Canadian Government made them a liberal grant of both land and money. They proved themselves an inoffensive people; but while many of their beliefs are extremely beautiful, others are but poorly suited to a work-a-day world. To the Divine command, "Thou shalt not kill," they give the widest interpretation; they regard war with horror; they will not so much as slaughter animals, either for food or clothing. The American Constitution says, "All men are free." The Doukhobors believe that every living thing is a member of God's household, and entitled equally with man to liberty.

They do not believe in individual ownership of property. In each village is a common storehouse, in which provisions and supplies are kept. All moneys are pooled. Individuals may contract debts outside the community, but the village to which they belong is responsible for payment. Canadians who have had pecuniary transactions with the Doukhobors speak highly of their integrity.

Many of the peasants perceived the impracticability of living up to their high ideals. To a large extent they adopted the practices of the country in which they had taken up their abode, and gained considerable prosperity. A few weeks ago, however, a wave of religious fervor swept over the community. Numbers of them liberated both cattle and horses; men and women performed the heavy farm work themselves. Women in teams of twelve pulled the ploughs, and the young men hauled the heavy loads of produce to the markets.

The vegetarian diet was more strictly adhered to. All food and drink to which animal products, directly or indirectly, contributed were given up. Then boots, woolen stockings and every article of clothing, wholly or partly made of leather or wool, were discarded. India rubber and cotton clothing was worn.

"Would you," said the elders, "murder your brother that you might be clothed in his skin? Would you slaughter your sister that her hair might be woven into garments for you? Why do it to the dumb beast, a child, as you are, of the Creator?" Then

The Pilgrims' Thanksgiving

A New Sermon by REV. FRANK DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

TEXT, PSALM 100: 4: "Be thankful unto him"

THE MAYFLOWER

THANKSGIVING Day of 1621 is our theme to-day. Plymouth Rock is the pulpit. The mighty trees of the American forests are the massive pillars of the sanctuary. Our dome is the blue skies of the heavens. The sunshine of the "Indian Summer," which derived its name from the time of Massasoit's visit to the Plymouth Colony to be the Pilgrims' guest on their first Thanksgiving Day, shall be our illumination. The waves of the fathomless deep, with their white fingers of foam playing upon the many keys of projecting rock, shall lead in our singing. The bold, bluff hillsides, overlooking the harbor of Plymouth, shall be our auditorium. And we shall gather within these four walls as worshippers, the stern-faced, iron-muscled, and godly voyagers of the little sailing-ship Mayflower, whose sacrifices made the Pilgrims' first Thanksgiving Day a possibility. Surely, if Governor Bradford and Elder Brewster, and Captain Miles Standish, and Edward Winslow, and Isaac Allerton, and John Alden, and that little band of two-score and ten men and women and children, had anything to be thankful for, 281 years ago, we Americans now living ought to welcome the Thanksgiving Day of 1902 with open arms. After the example of our noble ancestors, whose names have made the Plymouth Colony immortal, we should never cease to thank God for the goodnesses and the mercies he has showered upon us and our land during the past twelve months.

The proclamation which President Theodore Roosevelt sent forth, a few days ago, appointing the day when the autumnal queen of American festivals shall summon all people to worship at the sacred altars of church and home, was very similar in spirit to the verbal proclamation which Governor Bradford gave to the Pilgrim fathers and mothers in the autumn of 1621. The first Thanksgiving Day was really a harvest home festival. On that memorable morning, the new Governor—for John Carver, the first Governor, had lately died—personally led his people and guests into the house of worship, where a religious service was held. There the Psalms were sung. There the prayers were offered. There Elder William Brewster thanked God that he who had fed the flying birds and had clothed with fur the wild beasts of the forests, had fed and clothed and protected them. Then the rest of the day was spent as a home day, as a day of feasting and frolic and fun. Let me read to you the account which Edward Winslow, the historian of the famous colony, and one of the participants, wrote in reference to that day:

Our harvest being gotten in, our Governor, William Bradford, sent four men on fowling, so that we might rejoice after a special manner, after we had gathered the fruits of our labours. At which time, amongst other recreations, we exercised our arms, many of the Indians coming amongst us. Among the rest, their greatest king, Massasoit, with some ninety men, who for three days we entertained and feasted. And they went out and killed five deer, which they brought to the plantation and bestowed upon our Governor and upon Captain Miles Standish and others. And although it be not always so plentiful as it was at this time with us, yet by the goodness of God we are so far from want, that we often wish you partakers of our plenty.

Yes, even among all their sorrows and troubles, the Pilgrim Fathers had many, many blessings surrounding them on that first Thanksgiving Day. And it is to catalogue some of their ancient blessings, as well as some of the multitudinous blessings of our own time, that I preach this sermon.

The Pilgrim fathers rejoiced in religious liberty. They rejoiced that they could not only worship Christ in their own way, and according to their own belief, but also because, as Congregationalists, they could select their own pastors, and elders, and deacons, and have their own kind of a church government. It was in order to win this religious liberty, that the little band of Pilgrims first endured the persecutions in the village of Scrooby, England. It was to win this kind of religious liberty that in 1609 they emigrated from the English shores, and became exiles in Amsterdam. It was in order to win this religious liberty that the little band of Pilgrims, in 1610, broke away from Amsterdam, and under their pastor, the famous John Robinson, went to Leyden. And it was in order to win this religious liberty that the immortal one hundred and two passengers of the Mayflower, finally crossed the seas, and emigrated to a new and unknown world. Religious liberty means more than life, and comfort, and money, to strong, consecrated men. It means their combined temporal and spiritual existence. It means so much, that though one-third of that memorable Pilgrim band died the first month after they had landed upon the American shores, and though all, at one time, were helpless on account of sickness, except seven men and women, yet when the time came for the sailing of the Mayflower back to England, not one of the survivors would return to their old home, even though Governor John Carver and the company were ready to let any one go who would. The spirit which led the descendants of the Pilgrim fathers, a century and a half later, to shed their blood at Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill, to prove that "taxation, without representation, was wrong, and must not exist," was that same spirit which made the Pilgrim fathers on America's children and loved ones being gathered about the dining-room table, groaning under the weight of the best viands the markets afford may we thank God that that dinner will not be stopped on account of that grace. Oh, Religious Liberty, thou art not always honored in this twentieth century, if the living have never seen the dagger of bigotry drive into thy rich, warm, throbbing heart! Oh, Religious Liberty, before whose shrines Cromwell's Ironsides made the earth tremble, and at whose altars the Covenanters and the Pilgrims were ready to sacrifice the lives, may we be ready to rapturously greet thee next Thursday morning, and to reverently touch the purple hem of thy garment with the holy kiss of thankfulness. It was for this religious liberty that the Pilgrim fathers thanked God in 1621. It is for religious liberty that we, their children, ought to welcome the autumn queen of American festivals in this year of grace, 1902.

With humble prayer and fasting
In every strait and grief,
They sought the Everlasting,
And found a sure relief.
Their Covenant-God o'er-shadowed them,
Their shield from every foe,
And gave them here a dwelling-place
Two hundred years ago.

The Pilgrim Fathers, on America's first Thanksgiving Day, rejoiced because their harvests were all gathered in. Never did men and women and children work harder than those sturdy disciples of Christ during the first ten months of their sojourn in America. They were strict Sabbath-keepers. They were so strict in the rigid observance of the Lord's Day as a day of rest, Homer J. Webster tells us, that as a result of their teachings in the latter part of their first century in America, a "Captain Kemble, of Boston, who kissed his wife on his doorstep on Sunday on his return from a three years' absence, was fined for 'lewd and unseemingly behaviour.'" And that a Dunstable soldier was fined forty shillings for wetting a piece of an old hat to put into 'his shoes, to protect his foot, on the Lord's Day.'" But though the Pilgrim Fathers were strict observers of the Lord's Day as a day of rest, they just as rigidly believed that the other six days of the week should be days of hard and exhausting work. They practically worked all the time except Sunday. And as a result of that first summer's work, we find that those twenty-one men not only built seven houses and four public buildings, including the fort, but they also cleared much of that rough New England soil. They sowed twenty-one acres with corn, six acres with wheat, rye and barley, and surrounded their homes with garden plots.

But after the Pilgrim Fathers had done all this work, what was the result of their ingathered harvest? Enough to keep future famine from their doors? Enough to let them sit down and thereafter enjoy a season of ease and rest? Oh, no! The New England soil, even under the brightest conditions, never yields a great harvest. The first harvest which the white men gathered on Massachusetts land was very small. The New England Pilgrims knew they did not have, as Joseph had in Egypt, their storehouses full enough to defy seven years of want. They knew that unless help came soon they would have to face starvation. "Many a time," wrote the author of The Pilgrim Fathers of New England, "they went to bed to rest without knowing whence the next day's food was to come. How they were to live until the next harvest came round, it was an impossibility to say." Yet, those godly men, on Plymouth's first Thanksgiving Day, were able to thank God that he had given to them enough food up to the present time, and a land where they could ultimately earn a competency, if not a superabundance. They thanked him for the past. They trusted God for the future.

My friend, there ought to be a lesson for you in the Pilgrim Fathers' gratitude to God for the supplying of first Thanksgiving Day rejoice in religious liberty. They thanked God for religious liberty, even though the dead sleeping upon Burial Hill outnumbered the living. They thanked God for religious liberty, even though, to protect it, they had to go to church armed. While the main congregation prayed with their eyes shut, their sentinels on guard had to pray with their keen, vigilant eyes wide open. So next Thursday, fellow countrymen, let us thank God for religious liberty.

Let us thank God that, when we arise in the morning, we can gather our little children about the family altar and have morning prayers, without having any Lord Claverhouse pounding upon our door, or without hearing the tramp of any "Bloody" McKenzie's hirelings ready to lead us out to execution. When ten o'clock comes next Thursday morning, and we hear the bells of God's sanctuary tolling, let us be thankful that we do not have to worship our Heavenly Father in secret, as the early Christians used to do in the dark catacombs of ancient Rome, or as the Pilgrims before their embarkation secretly did it in the stable of the Scrooby manor house. When next Thursday we sit down to a Thanksgiving dinner and say grace, our their necessary temporal wants. You may not be a millionaire. You may not have a big bank account, nor enough money to keep you in ease, if you ceased to work. But, like the Pilgrim Fathers of old, on this Thanksgiving Day of 1902, you can thank God that you have a home in which to live, no matter how humble that home may be. You can thank God that you have enough clothes to keep you warm, and enough good, plain, wholesome food to eat. Should your table be simply spread, you can thank God, with the same humble, beautiful Christian spirit with which Elder William Brewster, of Plymouth Colony, gave thanks. Although the bread supply, and the coffee and tea supply, and nearly all other supplies for months had failed, and he and his family for weeks at a time were compelled to live upon fish alone, yet William Brewster used to gather his children about his table and utter a devout grace. With nothing but clams and oysters for breakfast, dinner and tea, month in and month out, William Brewster used to thank God "that they were permitted to enjoy the abundance of the sea and the treasures hid in the sand."

Removed from Temptation

The Pilgrim Fathers rejoiced because they had removed their children from the sinful temptations of a foreign land. They, themselves, were men and women of sterling and unimpeachable integrity. They were just as willing to lay down their lives as martyrs for Jesus Christ, in Leyden, in 1620, as were their three fellow-townsmen, Henry Barrows, John Greenwood and John Penry, who, in 1593, laid down their lives in England. But though the Pilgrim Fathers might be ready to die for Christ, their undeveloped children, on account probably of the influence of their foreign surroundings, were not always of the same mind. Their sons and daughters sometimes drifted away from the principles of their fathers. They not only fell into the sinful habits of this European city, but they married the sons and the daughters of the foreigners. They enlisted in the foreign navies, and went forth as free lances to the foreign wars. And it was in order to save their own flesh and blood from the sinful contact of the "uncircumcised Philistines," as well as for religious liberty, that the Pilgrim Fathers turned their backs upon the land of their adoption, and the homes of their friends. Shall we not then, on this Thanksgiving Day of 1902, be thankful that we can rear our children in a land whose silver dollar is stamped with the suggestive motto: "In God we trust." Taking our little children's faces between our two hands, and looking lovingly and earnestly into the depths of their pure eyes, can we not be thankful that both we and they are living in Christian communities, where human affections are held sacred?

We place a priceless value upon the physical lives of our children. Shall we not also place a priceless value upon their spiritual welfare? How much we value them, few of us realize, until we are brought face to face with the sore trial of parting from them. I used to consider myself a poor man, financially, until a few years ago. I never do so now, after the following experience. I had been visiting my mother in the East, and was returning with my wife and little daughter to my Pittsburg home. Being very tired from overwork, I lay down in the cars to sleep. Meanwhile, my little baby daughter began to smile and nod her head, at a stern-faced man reading across the aisle. She held out her hands for him to take her. After a while, his face lighted up with an answering smile. He took the baby on his lap and played with her hour after hour. As we neared the "Smoky City," this stern-faced man came to me and said: "Young man, I do not know who you are, but here is my card. I am one of the wealthiest men in Milwaukee. I have everything that money can buy; but I have a home without any children. Young man, you can thank God that you have a family. And if you are willing to give me this baby, and let me adopt her, I will give you a certified check for $50,000, and she shall be my daughter, and inherit all that I have." Of course, I refused the offer. I told that man there was not enough money in all the treasury of the United States to buy my flesh and blood. And, though you may laugh, when I talk about my $50,000 baby, yet I am not putting any higher valuation upon the physical lives of any one of my children, than every father sitting before me to-day would upon his. If we parents thus place so high our physical valuation of our children, shall we not also place just as high the spiritual valuation? Like the Pilgrim Fathers of old, shall we not rejoice this coming Thanksgiving Day, because our children are not only living in Christian homes, but also in Christian neighborhoods and under the shadow of the spires of Christian churches? Shall we not rejoice because on account of being born in a Christian land, they may the more easily learn to love Christ? Shall we not rejoice that on account of their spiritual advantages after their life's work is done, they will associate with us in the great Harvest Home, where an Eternal Thanksgiving Day shall be spent in the green pastures and by the still waters of heaven?

The Pilgrim Fathers rejoiced in the hope that they should soon be reunited with their loved ones, who were left behind in Leyden. The whole community of Pilgrims, which in 1610 settled in Leyden, did not cross the Atlantic in 1620, as many people suppose? No. Only a small part, 120 men, women and children, came first. The vast majority of that community remained behind. And so these American Pilgrims, on Plymouth's first Thanksgiving Day, were living in the hope that John Robinson and the absent members of his spiritual flock, would soon be by their side. They did not then know that death would first claim their beloved pastor, and that his bones would be buried in the little churchyard which his preaching has made world-famous, and which is to-day the Mecca of many a pilgrim. They did not realize that most of their earthly friends would never meet beside the waters of the New World. But they did know, and they rejoiced in the knowledge, that, whether at the foot of Plymouth Rock or at the foot of the Great White Throne of God, they would meet again. And if they did not meet again until they were reunited in that Better Land, then they would there meet to part no more.

The Joys of Reunion

My friends, cannot we rejoice in the hope that we are some day going to meet our redeemed loved ones? Can we not rejoice that when we meet them, we shall part no more? Thanksgiving Day without this blessed belief would be to us a meaningless festival, and would be robbed of its chiefest joy. The young people may look forward gladly to the autumnal queen of American festivals as a holiday from school, a day for a football match, a day when they can eat a big turkey dinner; but most of us will think of Thanksgiving dinner as a day for vacant chairs—a day when we would be willing to give all we owned if we could only bring back some who have forever gone from our side. But with the comfort of the blessed Gospel, how our sorrows can be turned to joy! Mother, father, brother, sister, husband, wife and child, shall we never, never meet you again? "Yes! Yes!" answer the Pilgrim Fathers, "By the sacred Book which we read the morning of the bright autumnal day when we celebrated Plymouth's first Thanksgiving Day, we can prove it. By the hope with which we parted from our dear ones, as we set sail from Holland's shores, we would tell thee, troubled hearts of 1902, we shall all, yea all, meet again."

Can we prove that we shall all meet our loved ones in heaven by a better way than the source from which the Pilgrim Fathers gathered their hope of a final reunion with their absent kindred? Upon the bold, bluff heights overlooking Plymouth Harbor, American patriotism has erected a colossal statue, commemorative of the heroic deeds of these first great ancestors. At the base of the pedestal rest four figures. These symbolize Freedom, and Education, and Law, and Morality. But these four figures, though beautiful in themselves, are all sitting at the feet of a gigantic statue called Faith. There Faith stands in mid-winter, not only overlooking the surging, angry waters of the mighty deep, but also the hallowed graves of the mighty men whose principles laid the foundation of this nation. There, the Pilgrims' Faith stands, with the opened Bible in one hand, and with the other hand pointing upward to where the spirits of the mighty and of the redeemed Pilgrim Fathers have passed to their reward. So, at the foot of that mighty statue of Faith with open Bible, may we all rejoice in the confident assurance that our Thanksgiving chairs at the family gathering shall not always remain vacant—that we shall all be together in the heavenly reunion.

A Day of Home Festivity

But while studying the history of Plymouth's first Thanksgiving Day, we must remember that it was not only a day for thanksgiving to God, but also a day made memorable by home enjoyments. The Pilgrim Fathers opened the day with prayer. They also felt they did not desecrate it when they gathered about the festal board, and laughed and joked, as well as talked about the great themes of the Gospel, while they sat at dinner. As far as possible all our people should make next Thanksgiving Day a home day, as well as a church day. And as the President of the United States, by his Thanksgiving Proclamation, has signed the death warrants for all the biggest and the fattest turkeys the barnyards have been able to produce in the past summer, let grandfather and grandmother, and all the children and the grandchildren meet again in the old homestead. Then as you sit at the board on which is the great, big, roasted turkey—which is the symbol of a Thanksgiving feast—I not only want you to cut the best and the tenderest slices for your mother and father and for your wife, but I also want you to be sure not to forget to cut off a large part of that turkey for the poor. There will be many people next Thursday morning who will have nothing to eat except the plainest kind of food, unless the Christian people, out of their abundance, are ready to help them. Then next Thanksgiving Day, after you have helped everybody all round, and after you have thanked God for all your many blessings, and after you have also worshiped in God's sanctuary, in spirit as your pastor, and as a privileged guest, I want to come into your dining-room. And though you may give different parts of the turkey to the different members of your family, I want you to save one part for me. I want you to save for me the "wish-bone," and as I in spirit come among you there, I want you to take hold of one side of that wish-bone and let me take hold of the other. Then, as I pull and break the wish-bone, and should I get the larger side, I want you to let me make this wish: "May the many blessings which God has showered upon you during the last twelve months soften your heart in gratitude to him. May the vacant chairs in your dining-room teach you that your earthly time is to be very short. Therefore, may you here and now resolve to love your Master as you have never done before. And in the earthly years that are left to you, may you be as faithful in your trust to your home, your wife, your children, and to the great world at large, as were the Pilgrim Fathers to the principles which they established. And may the sweet and holy faith of Plymouth's first Thanksgiving Day rest and abide with you forever." May God bless us this morning, as we use the tear-stained and blood-red-dened Rock of Plymouth for a pulpit.

QUAINT PSALMS FOR QUEER FOLK

...By...
Rev. C. H. Yatman

PSALM XXV.

The Psalm of Prayer

4. Shew me thy ways, O Lord; teach me thy paths.
5. Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation: on thee do I wait all the day.
6. Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercies and thy loving-kindnesses; for they have been ever of old.
14. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he will shew them his covenant.
15. Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.

TRUE WORSHIP

For true worship in prayer, and for grasp of a sinner's needs, from above, this petition is one of the most comprehensive compilations of request ever written. Every verse is a jewel. People who pray like this have the "secret of the Lord" with them, and integrity and uprightness are bulwarks of preservation.

PSALM XXVI

The Judgment Psalm

1. Judge me, O Lord; for I have walked in mine integrity: I have trusted also in the Lord; therefore I shall not slide.
2. Examine me, O Lord, and prove me; try my reins and my heart.
3. For thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes: and I have walked in thy truth.

"JUDGE ME, O LORD!"

Not the Great White Throne Judgment, but one that must come if at that place we stand without fear. "Judge me"—"Examine me." If God shall do that for us and then wash away all our iniquities, which he finds, we will not be gathered with sinners and bloody men either here or hereafter.

PSALM XXVII

The Tonic Psalm

5. For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion; in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me; he shall set me up upon a rock.

"HE SHALL HIDE ME"

What a powerful tonic is to the body, this Psalm is to the soul. Who can take its mixture of might and not feel the bracing power of its remedy? When ready to faint with the heat and heavy burdens of life, run for this medicine. The Great Physician prescribed it for the Psalmist and there is no patent to prevent its use by all people.

PSALM XXVIII

The Rock Psalm

1. Unto thee will I cry, O Lord my rock; be not silent to me; lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.

"THOU ART MY ROCK"

People whose feet are quick to slide—and there be many—need Psalm 28. Who ever went into a pit that kept his feet on the rock? There is no pit of perdition, either here or hereafter, to one who can say, "Oh Lord, thou art my Rock." "Some build their house upon the solid Rock, and some on the sinking sand."

 A WINTER CAMPAIGN TO WIN SOULS ***

An example is being set by the Christian workers of Washington, D.C., that is worthy of being followed in other cities. They are holding meetings for young men every Sunday afternoon, and are making them so attractive that large audiences are secured and valuable results are achieved. They are a continuation of a series of meetings held last fall and winter, the success of which encouraged them to resume them this year. Two considerations led to the adoption of this movement. One of them was the ascertained fact that the Church and the Young Men's Christian Association are failing, by ordinary methods, to reach more than a fraction of our American young men. It is asserted by some workers that only two per cent. of the young men in our chief cities have any church connection; the other is, that Sunday afternoon is crowded with temptations in these days more than any other part of the week, being generally surrendered to Sunday pleasures and dissipation. Christ's saying, that the world showed more wisdom than the church, has been verified, for the world was first to realize and turn to account the fact that Sunday afternoon was a period of leisure for young men. But the negligence need not continue. The churches of Washington, with the co-operation of the Y. M. C. A., determined to provide a counter-attraction, and their combined efforts are proving signally successful. The annual report of the religious work of the International Y. M. C. A. Committee places the Sunday afternoon meeting in Washington, with its average attendance of 1,155 men for twenty-five consecutive weeks of fall, winter, and spring of last year, first of all in the list of successes in this line.

The attendance is not the only element of excellence, for an average of twenty men have decided each Sunday to begin a Christian life. Mr. S. W. Woodward, the president of the Association, has supported this evangelistic movement with enthusiasm, giving not only generously of his money, but of his time and thought. The secretary, Mr. Lyman L. Pierce, is, of course, the soul of the movement. He comes here from Trenton, N. J., with the reputation of great success in men's meetings, which he has increased in this larger field. One of his chief assistants in this part of the work is Commissioner Henry B. F. MacFarland.

The first element of success is in securing really evangelistic speakers. They are all selected long in advance, men who are not only well known, but also of proved effectiveness in evangelism. No speakers are great meetings last year, when not only the spiritual but the ethical side of Christianity was powerfully presented, a large number responded to the invitation of the Gospel, and the entire audience listened intently to the evangelist's powerful, unanswerable appeals.

The next effort which has contributed to this success is very liberal advertising. Fifty thousand cards and letters are sent out every week. The men who attend one of the meetings get three cards each, to use among their friends in getting an audience for the next meeting. From two to four thousand envelopes, also containing three cards each, are mailed to persons sufficiently interested to be likely to use them. The cards are placed in hotels and restaurants, sent out in laundry packages, and in various ways, so that every young man in the city is sure to have at least one invitation to the meeting. The press is used freely, of course, in addition to these cards of admission.

It is evident that the receipt of a free admission card operates as a special invitation, and is appreciated.

But the most distinctive part of the work is the way in which the results of the meeting are harvested. Mr. W. H. H. Smith is the chairman of a band of "yoke-fellows," who are seated among the audience, each group having specified seat under their supervision, so that when a man rises in response to the speaker's appeal, thus expressing a desire to be a Christian, he is sure to be grasped by a friendly hand when the meeting breaks up. Personal conversation follows, and he is urged to take definite action by signing a card containing these three pledges:

"I have an honest desire henceforth to live a Christian life."

"I am willing to follow any light God may give me."

"I ask the people of God to pray for me."

He is invited to come to the mid-week meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association, and he receives another invitation of the same purport, by mail, from the secretary the next day. Some one of the "yoke-fellows" becomes acquainted with him, and when he has learned his name, address, past experience, whether a backslider or not, he sends the information to the pastor of some church which the young man attends, or for which he may have a preference. In this way, every one who has an impulse toward a new life is brought under Christian influence. W. F. C.

invited merely because they are well known. They must have had success in winning men to Christ. The season opened this year with Evangelist J. Wilbur Chapman, and the second speaker for the season was Dr. C. A. Barbour, of Rochester. Dr. W. F. McDowell, of New York, is also in the list. Rev. G. Campbell

KING TURKEY. MONARCH OF FESTAL BOARDS

THE Old World owes a large debt to the New for the turkey, which lordly bird appropriately crowns Europe's obligations to us, as represented by the potato and Indian corn, introduced on that continent with the discovery of the country destined to become the world's greatest republic—on which event even king's tables had to wait. In the sixteenth century, a turkey was a gift a British subject was proud to offer the throne. It has been said that our handsome and edible barnyard bird, rather than the eagle, should be our national emblem.

We freely exchange eagles on coins for turkeys. Our annual turkey trade is estimated at $12,000,000, including sales of eggs and breeding stock. For the last, Europe continues to draw liberally upon us. At this season, however, we send few turkeys of any kind abroad; we need them at home. The week closing Wednesday before last Thanksgiving, about 600,000 turkeys, averaging eleven pounds each, were sold in New York City alone. Had these been entirely for metropolitan consumption, the allowance in even distribution among our three and-a-half million people would not have fallen far short of one turkey to every family of five. A certain percentage were shipped to outlying towns; but as some 200,000 chickens and geese swelled poultry sales here, it may be comfortably inferred that many households, unable to buy turkey, had yet a fowl to grace their Thanksgiving board. Equable distribution, of course, does not exist. Hundreds of homes have more turkey than is good for digestion, others none at all and little else to eat, though charitable organizations and private benevolence seek to remedy these conditions. The churches and the Salvation Army fill many empty larders. The Bowery Mission alone feeds thousands who would else have hungry holiday.

ON A NEW ENGLAND TURKEY-FARM

Considering the fact that in no section is Thanksgiving celebrated with more fervor than in New England, where the festival originated, the claim that Boston leads as a turkey-market seems reasonable. Yet that New England be not charged with gluttonous appetite for turkey, let it be remembered that she produces less than her quota of these birds compared with other sections. According to the last census, there were 6,599,369 live turkeys over three months old in the United States, June 1, 1900. Massachusetts had only 3,018 of these, less than any State except New Hampshire. Texas led with 648,671; Illinois followed with 446,020. It is to be hoped that when our census men went the rounds many turkeys had taken to the woods and so were not counted. If this was not the case, the fact is clear that our turkey production has fallen off greatly in the last decade, for the previous census showed 10,754,060 turkeys on the corresponding date.

LOVE AND THANKSGIVING

By MARGARET BOTTOME

[AM glad to be introduced to so many new friends on Thanksgiving Day. It used to be, and still is, in New England, a day of good cheer, a day of feasting and of merriment, to all who can get home on Thanksgiving Day. Maybe we did not see in the early days, as we see ow, how much Thanksgiving Day means. Perhaps some of us have not yet reached the stage in life where it is becoming clearer that all life means something grander in the future.

HUNGRY FOR A LETTER LIKE THOSE YOU USED TO WRITE"

In my introduction to you all at this time, I hope at our acquaintance with each other through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will result in our feasting together on the luxuries of the Spirit that are provided for us. I meet, in one way or another, with "all sorts and conditions" of women, especially am I impressed with an absence among them of what I call "the wine of the spirit—Joy!" I met a friend this past summer whom I did not see for years. I said to her, "Why, you seem younger than when I met you years ago." Then there was a look of joy in her face I could not understand. I learned that she was thinking about disposing of some property, which had associations for her that might make its loss rather depressing; but no—there was that peculiar joy. I could not understand it, and alluded to a number of times.

A few days ago I received a letter from her, telling me she was engaged to be married. "There," I said to myself, "that accounts for it all—she was in love!" Why didn't I think of that? Love is wine—human love is, and the reason for the absence of joy in so many is that they are without love. They did have it, but it gave out, and they do not know the one who can change life's water into wine, and so life is insipid to them, and they are insipid to themselves. "The life is gone out of them," as we say.

There is a listlessness about some people as if nothing ever happened any more. The child-nature has gone, or it has never come. Children are always expecting something when they are happy children; but we miss this in many grown people. The people who have the wine of the kingdom are always thankful! Thankfulness of spirit is wine. Such people murmur to themselves, "Oh, I feel so thankful." They are thankful when it rains, the earth needs it, so they say. They are thankful when it doesn't rain, "it's so lovely to have the sunshine." They are never at a loss for thankfulness, simply because the spirit of thankfulness is in them. I am peculiarly blessed in having had a mother who was always thankful. I never saw her a moment in my life when she wasn't thankful.

Maybe we haven't marked the little word "be." The command is, "Be ye thankful," not be thankful for something, though you will be, but you see it is a spirit, a condition of the mind and of the heart. It is a priceless fortune to have the spirit of thankfulness. The most natural thing for my mother to say, when she asked me, will be, "Margaret, I am so thankful you have come." Going to heaven isn't going to change us very much; we shall be ourselves, and what characterized us here will characterize us there. I shall never forget hearing Canon Gore, when he visited this country, say, "What makes death so awful is that it does not change anything." We are on earth now, and we want to make earth as much like heaven as possible.

Maybe some people are forgetting that they are to make their families, their homes, heavenly. And when I say the home, I don't leave out the kitchen. The most effectual way of solving the "servant problem," to my mind, is to see how happy you can make those who are in the kitchen. I know there are women—and professing Christian women—who do not go into their own kitchens except to order. Queen Victoria, I have read, went into her kitchen, even when she did not order anything. Not even servants can live on orders.

I heard of a young girl who left a nice house to go to work in a factory. Some one said to her, "How could you do it? Didn't you have a nice room for your own? (All do not have one.) She said she had, and plenty to eat. "Well, what made you go?" She had one answer, "They didn't seem to think I had a heart." And it might be well if we remembered that all in the family have hearts.

I read something a few days ago that made me smile; but I understood it. A young wife who had married very happily, and had, as we say, "about everything," surprised her husband one day, by showing traces of tears. He noticed the fact, and said, "Why, my dear, what is the matter? You have been crying." And as the tears started again, she said, "Oh, yes, I am so hungry." "Hungry!" he said, "what for?" "Oh," she said, "I am so hungry for a letter like those you used to write me before we were married."

He looked at her, stooped and kissed her, and took in the whole situation. Her heart was hungry! He had become immersed in business, and he saw, in a flash, just what she missed. He did not tell her she was foolish, and should not act like a child, but he passed into his library, turned the key, sat down to his writing-desk and wrote her a love-letter, called her his "sweetheart" just as he used to do—and she was satisfied. That was a wise man—wiser than many men would have been.

I said to a friend of mine, whose husband was absent from home, "You miss—," calling him by name. "Oh, no," she replied, "I don't think I really do. You see I have only to arrange his paper in the morning at the breakfast-table. I never could see his face, it was behind the paper, and he never talked at the table; he wanted to read his paper and of course he did not want me to speak to him. And he was never home nights,

A DAUGHTER OF THE KING

MARGARET BOTTOME

and I always left him reading when I went to bed. So," she added, "you see I don't miss him much." Now, it certainly was all right, his reading his paper and all the rest of it; but I am sure he missed something that would have made that woman miss him, and then she would have said to me, "Yes, I do miss him. To be sure he is immersed in business; but he always has a cheery smile for me, and I especially miss his kissing me."

It is astonishing how a woman can miss a kiss. I should feel poverty-struck, as a mother, if my boys did not kiss me very often. To be sure, there is a difference in families; some are more in the habit of kissing than others. But I am bound to be true, just on this subject that is not often spoken of. I have lived long enough to see how things come out, and I know that nothing can take the place of sentiment—not sentimentality, but the expression of love.

THE WOMAN WHO WAS "THANKFUL FOR EVERYTHING"

You men say, "Of course, she knows I love her." You make me think of a woman who used to speak in the prayer meeting when I was a girl. She was a good woman, but rather illiterate, and she had a way of saying she was "thankful for everything!" Her husband had become quite well off but he never attended church, and she would say, "I ought to be thankful my husband is such a good provider." We always laughed, for she certainly conveyed the idea that they had plenty to eat. Poor soul! there evidently was a part of her—and the best at that—that he did not provide for.

Now it seems to me Thanksgiving Day is a nice time to see, not merely how prosperous we are as a nation, but something more, and closer home. Might it not be well to have a little more love at home? The years are passing; separations will come—they have come to others, they will come to you. Will it not be wise to make the most of our blessings? If you would miss your wife, tell her so. If the children are a comfort, tell them so. And cheer up the husband whom you would not know how to get along without, if he was taken from you. Let us express more. I do not say we haven't the love, but we are in danger of not expressing it. I wish you would make the attempt. You will be so glad, some day, that you did. I will admit you are thankful; but just say so, say so to yourself, say so to God, say it to those around you, beginning at home; and if you will, in this sincere, natural way, express your thanks, I believe one real Thanksgiving Day will make you feel as though you would like another. And so you will get where all your days will be Thanksgiving Days, and when the last day comes, you will be full of thanksgiving that you have the Father's House to go to, and that some day you will sit down to the great Thanksgiving Feast, where the joy will be that none are missing.

OUR NEW CONTRIBUTOR

SITTING amid the palms, with sunshine falling on her snowy hair and happy face, Margaret Bottome, counselor of comfort and cheer, who has carried God's message to many hearts, makes a picture of pleasantness and peace in her home on Seventeenth street, New York. On a little table near her lies an always-open Bible—much-worn, much-marked, but tenderly used. "The gates," she said, laying her hand on the sacred Book, "are not shut at all by day. Here one may ever find strength and refreshing." In spite of her crown of silver locks, she does not look in the least her age. Her face has somewhat the freshness of a child's. "I am not a finished woman," says Mrs. Bottome. "I feel as if I

Thanksgiving

A NATION at prayer! The spectacle is an object lesson to the whole world. We are sometimes ridiculed as a bragging, boasting people, but on Thanksgiving Day we make solemn and national acknowledgment of the source of our blessings. The time is past when, in superstitious ignorance, we attribute to God events which are the direct result of our own effort, or regard as his punishments, afflictions produced by our own folly. But back of all second causes, we recognize on this annual celebration, the Divine First Cause on whose beneficence we depend. There is no lack of reason for such a tribute. Year by year the nation has grown in influence and in wealth and power. At no time in its history has it stood so high in the world's esteem as it does to-day; at no time has it been so prosperous. Our harvests have been abundant, our manufactures are prodigious, the national treasury is overflowing. No war has ravaged our shores, no plague has come near our dwellings, no physical convulsions have desolated our States. Peace within our borders, prosperity within our palaces, surely of all nations on earth we have most reason to bless and thank the Giver of all good.

The acknowledgment we this day tender to our Heavenly Father, should teach us our dependence on him for the future. It should be a day of prayer, as well as of thanksgiving. There are many blessings we need, which he can bestow. There are problems to be solved, which no people has ever yet solved, and which can be solved rightly only by the aid of divine wisdom. There is the problem of poverty. While we thankfully acknowledge the plenitude of our national wealth, we are reminded daily of the existence of individual poverty. It is a growing menace to our civilization, an anomaly that is a disgrace to an intelligent nation. These men who lack the necessities of life, who herd in wretched tenements, and who know not on one day whether they will have bread on the morrow, are our brothers, and in many cases their hardships are their misfortune, not their fault. God alone knows the difficulty in all its ramifications; he alone can give us the wisdom to deal with it.

Then there is the problem of vice. How can we solve that? It is appalling to think of the growing menace of drunkenness, murder and robbery. Can we regard ourselves as a godly nation, as we read the reports in our daily journals? We cry out to our legislators for more stringent laws, and to the executive for more vigorous administration. These things, we say, must be put down; but they are down enough already. What we need is for the people to be so raised, so elevated, so purified, that they will resist the temptation to these evils. Only by the power of God can that change come. We may help to bring it about, for it is God's way to work with us and through us; but a beginning has scarcely been made. The best minds, the most powerful intellects among us, all we have of philosophy and philanthropy, must be brought to bear upon the problem, that our land may be delivered from its plagues.

As we thank and praise God on this day appointed for thanksgiving, we should do well to appeal to him in humility for help in our social difficulties. There is hope in such a course. It is his desire that all people should learn to know him and should reach a higher, happier life. It would please him to find us as a nation seeking the same object, and he who has given us wealth as a nation would give us the wisdom that is better than wealth.

Sport or Murder?

THIS is the season of the hunter. It is the boast of one famous nimrod, that he is responsible, through his personal good marksmanship, for the death of many thousands of wild creatures, his unerring eye and hand being equally successful in shooting birds on the wing, boars in the forests, and smaller game that creeps or scurries along the fields and woodland ways. From time immemorial, men have gone forth with hounds and guns to kill. One wishes that men, so fine in many ways, were more tender of animal life. Cruelty is a blot on any escutcheon, and killing for mere killing's sake has no excuse that we can see. Rudyard Kipling has avowed his belief that the New England farmer, with a gun in his hand, has an unconquerable desire to exterminate all living things that do not serve him, or in some manner minister to his comfort or his bank account. Birds, hares, squirrels, all die to gratify the vanity or the love of excitement of the yeoman who goes forth to shoot them in their haunts, and the silence of death often broods over the New England woods in consequence of this cruel and unwholesome passion for sport.

But what is to be said about New York State, where very soon two large fraternities, meeting in friendly rivalry, are to have one or two days shooting in a grand and extraordinary battue? Each party is to be represented by a trained team, expert in the art of killing, and everything that is hit, maimed, mangled, or destroyed outright, is to count on the successful score. A game preserve at the mercy of these ruthless hunters will present a sanguinary scene when they have finished their work.

Surely He who sees when a sparrow falls, must look with anger on such a massacre of the innocents. Do we not need an awakening of conscience in this one regard? Ought we not to so train our children that they will feel that cruelty to animals shall inevitably blunt their sensibilities, lower their moral tone, and make them less gentle to human pain? Everything that is said in behalf of the good effects of sport is neutralized by its brutality.

Building for Eternity

TIME is one of the means by which every man's work shall be tried. There are edifices in the world so nobly wrought that time has only given them added grace, and has left no other mark upon them. But if the building is not good, time will infallibly reveal the flaw.

Peterborough Cathedral, one of the most famous in England, and whose western front is said to be the grandest and finest in all Europe, was built without foundations, and for seven hundred years the great church stood and seemed perfectly stable. Then, at last, the tower fell, the walls cracked, and it became necessary to expend fifty thousand pounds to achieve that which ought to have been done at first.

The most beautiful building ever erected on earth is the Parthenon. Its majestic proportions, its noble columns, its solid simplicity and its marble purity combine to make it incomparable. It has survived more than twenty centuries, but the world has recently been shocked to learn that at last it seems about to perish—to collapse, as did the famed Campanile at Venice. Only careful and thorough restoration, says Dr. Dorpfeld, will preserve it, and this the impoverished Greek Government can hardly accomplish. What is the explanation of this impending calamity? Is it the result of natural wear of pure white marble? Not at all. It has been discovered that the builders rejected the poorer stone—that with colored veins, for all parts of the temple that could be seen, but used it for interior work that was covered up. In the course of time, this interior has been affected by the elements, the stone has rotted and split where it was imperfect, and will not support the weight of the walls. And now these imperfect stones must, if possible, be replaced, or the chief architectural glory of the world will perish in the next earthquake.

It is so with character—with our work and with our life. If we build hastily or dishonestly, if we put the white marble on the outside, and the spotted, streaked stone—that with veins of base, corroding material—in the covered places, then time is our enemy, and in the day that we think not, long delayed though it may be, time will be avenged upon us.

Every now and then a book appears in which some one has been bold enough—we almost feel like saying cruel enough—to publish the whole truth about the lives of men who once stood before us gloriously exalted and all but flawless; and when we have looked we turn away sick at heart for another idol in the dust; for the weakness and smallness and vileness mixed with and hidden under the grandeur and the beauty.

It is the covered blocks that make the true character, and assure stability when the earthquake comes.

The Thanksgiving Kaleidoscope

ON Thanksgiving Day the memory becomes a kaleidoscope, and every minute the scene changes. You go to the kaleidoscope of memory a turn and there they a natural as life, around the country hearth on a cold winter night. Hear the hickory fire crackle and see the shadow flit up and down the wall. Games that sometimes well-nigh upset the chairs—"Blind Man's Buff," "Who's Got the Button," "The Popping Corn," "The Molasses Pulling," and the witch stories that made the neighbor's boys afraid to come home after dark. Hickory nuts on one dish, roseate apples on the other. The boisterous plays of "More Bags on a Mill," "Leap Frog," "Catcher," around and around the room until some one got hurt, and a kiss was offered to make the hurt, the kiss more resented than the hurt. High o times! Father and mother got up and went into the next room because they could not stand the racket. Then, instead of compunctions of conscience, a worse racket. Now the scene is fading out. The old fireplace is down, and the house is down with it. One of those boys went to school and was never heard of. Another became squire in the neighboring village. Another went to college and became minister. Another died the following summer, and they are all gone, and you had better turn the kaleidoscope quickly or you will get us all crying.

There! Turn it on farther, for I want to see that old Thanksgiving dinner. Father at one end, mother at the other end, the children between, wondering if father will ever get done carving the turkey. Oh, that proud, strutting hen of the banyard, upside down, his plumes gone and mint his gobble. Stuffed with that which he can never digest. The brown surface waiting for the fork to plunge astride the breast-bone, and with knife sharpened on the jamba of the fireplace lay bare the folds of white meat. Then the pies. For the most part a lost art. What mince pies, in which you had all confidence, fashioned from all rich ingredients instead of miscellaneous leavings which are only a sort of glorified hash! Not mince pies with profound mysteries of origin! But mother made them, chopped the meat for them spiced them, sweetened them, flavored them, and laid the lower crust and the upper crust, with here and there a puncture by the fork to let you look through the light and flaky surface into the substance beneath. No brandy, for old folks were stout for temperance. Dear me! What a pie! You deluded New Englanders can talk till you are gray about your pumpkin pies for Thanksgiving Day; give me an old-fashioned New Jersey mince pie. Of the ten at that table, all are gone save two—some in village churchyard some in city cemetery—but we shall sit with them yet at a brighter banquet. Better turn the kaleidoscope.

Turn again the kaleidoscope, and there is the old meeting house, solemn and sleepy, bumble-bees humming about the old clap-boards, horses under the shed stamping at the flies. Choir in the gallery with a broken fiddle. Farmers in their sleeves aroused from their slumbers by the hymn: "My drowsy powers, why sleep ye so?" Aged minister, good enough for translation. The old church, from floor to ceiling full of old-fashioned religion, one ounce of which is worth twenty tons of the humbug of modern evolution. Where's the old minister now? Where's the choir now? Where are the leaders who sat around the pulpit and listened till the sermon got to the seventeenthly?

When you sit down on Thanksgiving Day to your repast, if one be absent from you and absent from earth, whose voice was most gleesome last Thanksgiving, do not let your grief overpower your gratitude: be hushed, bow your heads for a blessing, and say: "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever."

What Does the Oak Say?

Are not many curious to know what the oak says? The Speaking Oak, our beautiful new premium book, shows that all things have a voice if one will but listen. "It may be," says Dr. Iglehart, the author, "that young men or women will find in these stories some new light on the pathway of life, some noble ambition, brighter hope or better service; that they will hear a voice above the oak or star calling to a higher destiny." This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, only $2.

A Great Treasure

The Red Letter Bible was duly received. I have shown it to quite a number of my friends and all concur in saying that it is the grandest thing they have ever seen in print. While I have been fond of reading the Old Book of the Law, there is something about it in this form that carries fresh inspiration. It is to me a great treasure. A. G. WINSTEAD, Henderson, Ky.

THE BURNED BRIDGE AFTER THE FIRE.

The Burned Bridge

ONE of the most difficult fires the firemen of New York have had to fight in recent years, occurred on November 10. It was on the summit of one of the towers of the new bridge over the East River. The tower is three hundred and sixty-five feet high, beyond the reach of hose or water-tower. As explained in this journal on July 16, the bridge is so near completion that, it was hoped, it would be ready for traffic by the end of next year. The four huge cables, each eighteen inches in diameter and three thousand feet long, have been strung across the river, from the anchorages in Brooklyn to those in New York, passing over the tops of the steel latticed towers. Each cable contains 7,796 wires, and is estimated to be capable of bearing a weight of 98,000 tons. Many of the steel ropes, which are to support the permanent roadway for the cars, have already been attached to the cables. The workmen who do this, use wooden pathways, which run between the cables, and are suspended from small cables, two and a half inches in diameter, running parallel with the great cables. The workmen, about one hundred in number, were just leaving work on November 10, when they noticed a bright light on the top of the southern New York tower. It was evidently a fire, but how caused none of them knew. They all, however, realized how serious it was, for only that day, thirty large barrels of oil had been hoisted there, and there were about fifty thousand feet of lumber stored on the tower. An alarm was given at once, but when the engines came it was found to be impossible to reach the blaze with the hose. The fire must burn itself out, which it did in about six hours. With heroic intrepidity the firemen and the bridge workmen climbed the staircase inside the towers to cut away the footway that they used in their work, so as to prevent the fire running across the river. But already the connection had been broken, for the little cables, from which they depended, had melted in the intense heat, allowing the roadway to drop several feet. The spectacle during the fire was wonderful. The flames ascended skyward, while burning logs, and rivets and iron beams, at white heat, fell downward to the earth and the river. It is believed that the great cables have not been seriously injured, and that the damage to the towers and other parts of the structure can be repaired in about two months. The oil and timber destroyed are, of course, a heavy loss, which falls upon the contractors. The origin of the fire is still a mystery.

The most probable explanation is that in banking the fire in one the forges on the top of the tower, that are used for heating the rivets, a live coal must have fallen on the oily cotton waste that was lying around, thus causing a fire which would soon reach the oil and the timber stored nearby. Happily, no lives appear to have been lost, though one or two firemen were seriously hurt by the falling debris. It was well for the contractors that the material they had used in the cables and towers could resist the fire. They had pledged themselves that it should be fireproof, but there was apparently little likelihood that it would be so severely tested. Had they not fulfilled their pledge their loss would have been enormous. It is so with the work that Christ's servants do for him. They are warned against building into the church base human material, which the fires of the last judgment will destroy.

The fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned he shall suffer loss (1. Cor. 3: 13-15).

Curing Club Feet

Dr. Lorenz, the famous Austrian surgeon, who came to this country from Vienna to perform an operation on the daughter of Mr. Armour, of Chicago, has been making a trip across the continent. A few days ago, while at San Francisco, Cal., he operated, free of charge, on a child who had been born with club feet. They were bent inward and upward until the soles faced each other and left as the only possible walking surface the outer rear edges of the feet. Dr. Lorenz took each tiny foot in his hands and powerfully turned them round into the right position, practically wringing the soft little feet as though they were of plastic clay. In that way he destroyed the tendency to form in the improper shape. He pulled the little tissues and ligaments around to where they should be and impressed the soft baby bones into proper position. The baby, soothed to sleep by ether, was not conscious of any pain. A plaster cast was placed about the rearranged joints, leaving the toes exposed, so that the blood circulation may be observed during the six or nine months that the plaster mold is to be kept on. Dr. Lorenz said that only in early childhood was such an operation possible. Happily, in spiritual matters it is not so. Many a man has had reason to utter the praise of the Divine Physician which was rendered by the prophet:

He will make my feet like hinds' feet and he will make me to walk upon my high places (Hab. 3: 19).

Streets Paved with Gold

A press dispatch from Denver, Colo., says that "for some time past the authorities of Altman, in the Cripple Creek district, which enjoys the distinction of being the highest incorporated town in the world, have been paving the streets with rock taken from the waste dump of the Pharmacist mine. Some of it looked so well that samples were taken at random and assayed, and the returns showed an average value of $20 in gold a ton. As a result, men began hauling away the street surface, until stopped by the police. The Pharmacist Company has ceased giving away the dump, and is hauling it to the reduction mills." Wealthy as this country is, it has not yet arrived at the point when it can afford to pave the streets with ore that contains gold. The precious metal can be put to a use that will do more good. When in that glorious time yet to come on this wearied, troubled world, there ceases to be need of money, it may be used for street paving, as in that city which the Seer of Patmos saw in vision descending out of the heavens to the earth, in which there was neither poverty nor sin.

And the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass (Rev. 21: 21).

Desolation from a Volcano

The Pacific mail steamer Newport, which arrived at San Francisco, Cal., on November 12, brought news of widespread desolation in Guatemala as the result of an eruption of the volcano of Santa Maria, in Quezaltenango district, on the seaward slope of a small range of mountains separating Quezaltenango from the port of Champerico. Enormous quantities of ashes were thrown up, which fell like a snowstorm as at Pompeii in A.D. 79. Many human beings are said to have been buried alive, as well as thousands of horses, cattle and other animals, and rich coffee plantations were ruined. The loss of the new crop of coffee will amount to 15,000 tons. Americans in Champerico said the towns of Palmar, San Felipe, Colombia and Coatepec had been destroyed, with probably great loss of life. The ashes thrown from the volcano still lay over the plantations to a depth of six or seven feet, and the houses had been crushed by the weight of mud and stones. Falling ashes and floating pumice stone were encountered by the Newport at sea, one hundred and thirty miles away from the volcano. Simultaneously came reports of volcanic disturbance in Sicily and other parts of the world. It would appear that some cause, not yet understood, is producing general subterranean perturbation. Human wisdom is powerless in the presence of such phenomena, but they teach the same moral lesson now as they did in former days.

The elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burnt up. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy living and godliness? (II. Peter 3: 10.)

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. Dr. George F. Pentecost is now on his way to Japan, where he will take up evangelistic work in connection with the "Taikyo Dendo," or Twentieth Century movement, which was begun two years ago in the Mikado's realm.

Dr. W. B. Rankin, General Secretary of the John C. Martin Educational Fund, is now visiting the Colleges of the South in which the education of colored preachers is conducted, and is delivering courses of lectures. He will spend one week at Washington College, Tenn. Thence he goes to Shreveport, La. Mr. Martin has received so many testimonies to the benefit these lectures are affording the preachers, that he is encouraged, and purposes during the winter to give increased personal attention to its development.

The address of the Bible Teachers' Training School is 1036 Sixth avenue (corner Fifty-eighth street), New York. All exercises are held in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, at Fifth avenue and Fifty-fifth street, except the Monday evening Bible class, which is held in Calvary Baptist Church, Sixth avenue and Fifty-seventh street, and the Tuesday night class, which meets in the Fourth Presbyterian Church, West End avenue and Ninety-first street. The syllabus of the first term now issued includes the subjects of lectures by Drs. White, Rogers, Schauffer, Gray and Gregory, Mr. Soltan and Misses Holmes and Thompson. All particulars may be obtained by writing to the school at 1036 Sixth avenue, New York.

"Beautiful Words in Red"

"The Red Letter Testament is worth the price of your paper," writes Mr. George A. Huntington, of Sharon, Mass. Another friend says: "We gave last Christmas a Red Letter Testament to each of our children, and we have never regretted this choice of a Christmas gift for them, nor have they. One of our little lads said: 'Papa, we're going to try to learn all the words in red for our gift next Christmas to you and mamma. One of us will learn one part of the words and another another part, and we think by Christmas our family will know all of Jesus' words.' They may not be able to accomplish all they set out to do, but at least they will have gone a long way towards storing away in their little hearts and consciences the beautiful, blessed words in red—the words of Him who spake as never man spake." The Red Letter Testament, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $1.85.

GLIMPSES OF THE NEW WHITE HOUSE

FOR many months past, the White House has been in the hands of a force of decorators and renovators, who are giving the historic building a thorough overhauling. It has been surrounded by a network of scaffolding, which is now gradually disappearing as the work approaches completion.

The lower floor of the White House, formerly a sort of general utility room, has been transformed into a series of cloak rooms for the use of guests at the White House winter social gatherings. From the basement a wide stairway leads to the floor above, where are the East Room, general reception room, Blue Room, Red Room, State Dining Room, pantry, etc. This is the finest floor in the building. The Dining Room will now accommodate over 100 guests, without using the East Room in addition, as formerly; its walls are decorated with the heads of lion, bear, elk, and buffalo. Blue silk hangings make the Blue room an appropriate title, while the Red Room is in red velvet, and the East Room in white and gold. Two bedroom suites now occupy the space formerly taken up by Secretary Cortelyou's private offices and by the telegraph clerks. These two extra suites afford ample accommodation for any extra guest to whom the Executive may wish to extend his hospitality overnight—a thing impossible in the old White House. The main corridor, heretofore used as an upstairs parlor, is unchanged. All the furnishings on the second floor have been made to conform to the style of the colonial period. Burlap is used on the walls, and on some of the floors, and the doors are equipped with glass knobs.

There is a marked simplicity about the bedroom furnishings in the White House. None of the rooms—not even that of the President—can be said to be sumptuous in appointments, while some are severely plain. Those of the President's children are perhaps simpler than the rooms of thousands of American children belonging to families in moderate circumstances.

To the reconstructed White House there will be four entrances. Callers on business and politics will go to the President's new offices on the west extension (shown in the photograph); diplomats and persons of distinction will enter at the southern door; the family and personal friends at the north door; and the public (during the winter receptions) at the eastern entrance. The new office building is connected with the main building by a terrace or esplanade, and contains the President's private office, a "Cabinet room," office of Secretary Cortelyou, a long room for the clerical staff, a small room for the telegraphers, and a large reception room for the general use of visitors.

THE HOTTEST CAPITAL ON EARTH

PROBABLY one of the hottest and most trying missionary stations in the world is Muscat, the capital of the large province of Oman, on the southeast corner of Arabia. On approaching the harbor, the land looms up in one mass of dark mountain ranges, crag on crag, black and barren, serrated and torn in fantastic manner, picturesque except for want of vegetation. The town itself is white by contrast against the black rocks, and has narrow, dirty streets, unattractive buildings, and masses of crumbling walls under the torrid heat of a burning sun, and a sweltering, damp climate.

The heat of Muscat is proverbial; all manner of stories are told by travelers to corroborate their exaggerated tales of "heat that boils like a caldron" or "fills the desert back of the town with roasted gazelles." The thermometer in the sun registers as high as 189 deg. F., and 109 deg. in the shade is not an unusual temperature. The town lies on the Tropic of Cancer, in the zone of greatest heat. Oman is, next to Yemen, the most fertile province in Arabia, and if only it had a good government would develop into a happy, prosperous country. But for ages past the inhabitants have been at war with each other. The roads are often unsafe, and the Bedouins take delight in robbing caravans. The whole region lies under the blight of Mohammedanism. The people are ignorant, superstitious, and fanatic, but wonderfully given to hospitality.

Long, long years after Muscat had given its muscatel raisins to the West, and Oman its luscious dates, the Church began to think of sending missionaries to these Mohammedans. The pioneers who prepared the way of the Lord all laid down their lives in the effort; Bishop French of the Anglican Church, and Peter J. Zwemer and George E. Stone from America, kindred spirits in their love for the Arab and their intense earnestness to offer all their strength for God's kingdom.

In response to an appeal from Mackay, in far-off Uganda, and after completing forty years of missionary service in India, Bishop French attacked single-handed this fortress of Islam. His strength failed, after ninety-five days of prayer and preaching; yet his grave at Muscat marks the beginning of the Gospel for Oman. The Arabian Mission took up the fallen banner, and ever since French's death, in 1891, there have been living witnesses to preach the Word and scatter its leaves of healing. My brother, Peter J. Zwemer, for five years held the fort at Muscat alone, and when he left his post and the school for rescued slaves which he had established, he came home only to die in the Presbyterian Hospital of New York—a second offering for Oman's redemption. George E. Stone followed in his footsteps and was faithful unto death.

The only missionary now at this lonely outpost of the Arabian Mission is Rev. James Cantine. The population of Oman is estimated at over one and a half million souls. For the past four years we have been praying and appealing for volunteers to help enter this long-neglected province; who will respond? S. M. ZWEMER.

THANKSGIVING AT THE FARM

BY MARGARET E. SANGLER

I.

THERE'S wood to burn, Melissa; we can keep the children warm;
I think the signs are hinting at a wild November storm;
But we who have a timber lot, and piles of hickory split
We may the closer hug the hearth, and dare the wrath of it;
Not like those city folk, who freeze because they haven't coal,
And in their stately mansions know the shiver of the pole.
So thanks to God, Melissa, for the axe and for the trees,
And blessings to His Name, who lets us chop them as we please;
The stubborn men who've fought so long about that mining strike,
Affect our comfort not at all; we do just what we like.

II.

There's food to eat, Melissa; we have apples in the bin,
And plenty in the cellar, till the pleasant days begin.
Our barns are packed with oats and hay, we've fodder in the stack;
Our table may be plainly spread, but we fear not any lack;
The boys and girls are rosy and plump, as plump can be;
Let's thank our Heavenly Father for our crowding family.
Who cares for wealth, with health like ours; who longs for style and fuss?
There's many a millionaire, my dear, who's poor, compared with us!
Almighty God, to thee we lift our glad and grateful song,
Thy mercies are to us renewed and constant all day long.

WHO CARES FOR WEALTH, WITH HEALTH LIKE OURS;
WHO LONGS FOR STYLE AND FUSS?
THERE'S MANY A MILLIONAIRE, MY DEAR,
WHO'S POOR, COMPARED WITH US!

III.

We've kith and kin, Melissa, along the country-side,
And hearty greetings wait for us, and doors are opened wide
When forth we fare; we've dear old friends, we've known them since our youth, We'd stake our lives upon them, for their loyalty and truth.
We're toilers, dear Melissa, and the honest ground we till,
And Mother Earth gives back to us good grain for barn and mill;
We're toilers, and we're tired when the day's far end has come,
But we'd not for richest palace exchange our peaceful home;
So God be thanked for kith and kin, and God be thanked for love,
And for his hand in blessing stretched our humble lives above.

IV.

And we live in God's own country, this mighty land of ours;
Melissa, do we understand how vast are freedom's dowers?
The flag upon the schoolhouse, and the flag upon the spire,
And a heritage of liberty, passed on to son from sire.
The banner floating o'er us, a pledge of each one's right,
The symbol of unshackled faith, forever in our sight;
Oh, let us praise Jehovah for the banner of the blue,
That caught from heaven its stars of light and every glorious hue;
Oh! let us praise Jehovah, who has made so smooth our way,
We farming folk, who love him, as we keep Thanksgiving Day!

THE ROMANCE OF A THANKSGIVING PUMPKIN PIE

IF we could only have a pumpkin pie like mother made!" said John Mayberry, with a lonesome look in his eyes.

"Why can't we?" asked Mary, who had worn the title of Mrs. Mayberry two months. "I can make it."

"You don't know how."

"You'll tell me. You've said you used to help your mother cook. Besides, I know a good deal myself, and I have a receipt book. First, I catch my pumpkin."

"Be sure you don't catch a squash, May. Half the pumpkin pies you see in cities are made out of squash."

"I know a pumpkin. When I've caught my pumpkin, I stew it in milk."

"Cream."

"Oh, that's very expensive. I put eggs in—"

"Catch them young."

"I stir everything up—"

"Put spicy things in—cinnamon, ginger and pepper,

I think—not much pepper. No mustard, I believe."

"O yes! it looks like a little mustard's in it. It tastes that way sometimes."

"Well, no mustard, even if the receipt-book says so."

"Wherever the receipt-book differs from what you say, I'll follow you, and have pumpkin pies like mother's."

"O, May! I wish you knew her!"

"I will some day."

"If we could go home Thanksgiving!"

"Well, we can't. You've got to be at the store Friday morning, alas! We can't go and come and spend a day there in one day and two nights, John. So, John, we'll be happy here, our first Thanksgiving day, in our own home, if it isn't but two rooms; and I'll make the best pumpkin pie I can. John, I wish, instead of knowing stenography, I knew some of the things your mother knows."

"I'm satisfied with you. I'll eat the pumpkin pie."

"O, don't be rash!"

That day John wrote home: "DEAR MOTHER: I wish you knew my May. The poor child's going to try to make a pumpkin pie like yours, and I've promised to eat it. We can't afford a servant, and she does the cooking, and I— Never mind, she looks pretty trying, and you'd love her. Fortunately, we can't afford a whole turkey for her to cook—we'll buy a cooked portion from a restaurant. Just think of the string of turkeys in your yard, and the big ones browned in the cupboard! Now, don't try to send any, mother; it will cost us in express more than buying one, and we wouldn't let you pay. I only wanted you to know how I remember the good things at home. O, if I could make a living on the farm! And if May would go to ly in the screened corner that constituted her kitchen, but with such unsatisfactory results that her first experiments in pumpkin pies found their way into the garbage can. "I'll ruin John trying," she said at last, setting the final specimens away with many misgivings. Evening was at hand, and John would soon be home.

There came a rap at the door. She opened it, to confront an elderly, rotund woman in a dress of antiquated cut, and wearing a shawl around her shoulders. She carried on each arm a huge basket. Behind her stood a boy with another basket and a satchel. In spite of her old-fashioned appearance, there was something very winning and wholesome about her. A questioning look, half tender, half timid, played in her eyes, as if she were ready to turn round and go back if anybody told her. She was panting, smiling and patient, as May gazed wondering at her. Surely sweet, strong, brown eyes like those had looked love into her's before! Could it be—

"Are you May?" the newcomer asked, with tremulous lips. "I'm John's—"

"Mother!"

And May gathered her and her baskets into her little home. John came in to find the two laughing and crying over each other.

"I had to come, son," she said, "if I mortgaged the farm, I was just bound to see you and my new child.

And then I had to bring you children a turkey and some pumpkin pies and things."

Before she left them, she said: "John, father's old; he wants you should come and manage the farm, but not unless May says so." May said so, and they're at the farm this Thanksgiving.

the country! She is afraid she would get out of reach of civilization if she left New York."

May wrote: "DEAR MOTHER: Please write by return mail just how you make pumpkin pies. Your loving May."

RUTH AND NAOMI

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC. 7
RUTH 1: 16-22

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—ROMANS 12: 10:
"BE KINDLY AFFECTIONED ONE TO ANOTHER."

Home, Sweet Home

EVERY heart is a harp whose strings vibrate at the very mention of these tuneful words. The song is modern, but the institution which it enshrines is so ancient that it was a part of creation. All through the Old Testament and the New we get glimpses of home life, but there is hardly one more beautiful than that of our lesson story to-day. We see Naomi first as wife, and mother of two sons. In those days a name was also a description, and Naomi meant "a delight." How lovely and pleasant a companion she must have been to her husband Elimelech! Their home had in it the refining fires of suffering in the persons of the two sons, whose names, Mahlon and Chilion, both mean sickness. The ministrations which must have been necessary for these sickly sons made gentleness the keynote of the home of Elimelech and Naomi. And when the time of famine came, it was probably consideration for these weak ones that induced the parents to break the ties of native land, and make a home among strangers, where there was plenty of food to build up their strength. And so they left Bethlehem, and went to Moab.

Between the lines we may read that the two sons were benefited by the change, for they both became bridegrooms. But ere long the death angel made three visits to that family group, and each time took away with him a loved one, until Naomi, Ruth and Orpah were all left in widowhood. Then it was that Naomi was drawn by the love of home land to return to Bethlehem.

The newly woven cords of love between her and Ruth and Orpah could not bind her to Moab. Her tenderest associations drew her to the place of her marriage to Elimelech and the birth of her sons.

Did Naomi love Ruth and Orpah less than they loved her? It would seem so, for when Naomi proposed returning to Bethlehem, they said: "We will go with you," and they began the journey. Naomi tried to dissuade them from following her. Was Orpah less loving than Ruth? We must think so, for she was persuaded to return to Moab, while Ruth passionately clung to Naomi, saying: "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor from following after thee." Ruth was willing to give up all her friends and relatives for Naomi's sake, for she said: "Thy people shall be my people." And more than this, she was willing to give up her gods, and worship Naomi's God. "Thy God shall be my God." She wanted to be with Naomi both in life and death. "Where thou lodgest, I will lodge, where thou diest, I will die, and there will I be buried." Naomi could not say her "Nay," and so Ruth came with Naomi to Bethlehem.

Greatly changed did Naomi seem to her neighbors. She saw her sorrowful countenance reflected in their faces and recognized the discrepancy between her present sad state and her joyous name. She said to them, "Do not call me longer a delight but bitterness, not 'Naomi' but 'Marah.'" So deep was her bitterness that she hardly seemed to appreciate the love which Ruth bore her, for she said to her old friends, "I went out full but have come home empty." She even blamed God for her affliction. But none of these things caused the love and faithfulness of Ruth to abate. She did not faint nor fail in love's homeliest duties—the providing of food for Naomi.

Naomi seems to have been greatly touched by Ruth's devotion, for she began to consider how Ruth's life might be greatly blessed. It was then she thought that Boaz, the rich and noble farmer, might make a husband for Ruth. And wisely Naomi laid her plans, in strict conformity to Jewish law and custom. It is pleasant to read of the courtship in the fields of Boaz, where Ruth was sent to glean, and how one day Boaz filled her vail with six measures of barley in token that he would have her for his bride. And the story goes on, how a new home was set up, and how a little child was born, a child in whom the earth should be blest, for from Obed, the child of Boaz and Ruth, descended David, and David's greater son, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Illustrations and Applications

History has been mostly occupied with the stories of kings and generals, of battles and national crises; but of late we are having histories of the "People," with pictures of their homes and shops and trail marks of social progress. One such domestic history we find among the Old Testament's stories of judges and kings, of coronations and battles—this beautiful story of Ruth, "one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin." We see an almost ideal relation of capital and labor, industry and philanthropy, on the farm of Boaz, and an exemplary home, in that of Naomi, in which godliness is so lovely that it wins the foreigner in the family circle from the worship of images to the true God. The great truth to be taught in this lesson is, how parents and children can make A TRUE HOME, which is far more than a house.

A house is built of bricks and stones, of sills and posts and piers;
But a home is built of loving deeds that stand a thousand years.
A house, though but a humble cot, within its walls may hold
A home of priceless beauty, rich in Love's eternal gold.

—NIXON WATERMAN.

The whole story of Ruth—and the whole should be used in this lesson—gives us a full set of household pictures, beginning with a mother-in-law, whose name means "delight"

"ENTREAT ME NOT TO LEAVE THEE"

or "pleasantness," and that was her nature too. In these days, when the mother-in-law is the subject of so much undeserved satire, we can hardly read without a smile the sentence, "she dwelt with her mother-in-law." Ruth did this not from stern necessity, but from choice. She lovingly refused to be separated from her mother-in-law, even though to be with her she must be separated from her native land and kindred. In Ruth's attachment, as in a beautiful mirror, we see what a mother-in-law Naomi must have been. Not that she was perfect. We find between the lines sins enough escape by going to Moab came to three of them there. The famine in Bethlehem had been caused by enemies stealing the crops when the people had lost God's favor through sin. Going to Moab for bread was like running from God's chastenings, when they should have run to him in penitence. They had to take the chastening in a new form, as death thrice invaded the household. But Naomi must have been a woman of winsome goodness to be so loved by her daughter-in-law, that the latter insisted on going to a strange land in order to be with her till death. Orpah went only the little way that Oriental courtesy required when an acquaintance was going away, but "Ruth clave unto her." Naomi bade her count the cost. In Moab she would be among kindred and in her native land, and could probably marry again and live in comfort. In Bethlehem she would be among strangers and would probably be a poor widow to the end. But Naomi's fellowship was more than all else to Ruth. She faltered not even when she must glean with the poor behind the reapers to get a scanty support for herself and Naomi. Sacrifice is sweet to love, and she gladly put all earthly good on love's altar, expecting nothing in return but love.

This part of the story shows how personal affection may be a missionary sickle to glean souls for God. If we would only love more intensely the human hearts about us, how many we might thus draw to a diviner love! Even in our homes we should love more and tell it more, instead of counting it the privilege of intimacy to speak the fault-finders that politeness makes us suppress elsewhere. Mrs. Brownning wrote:

Say over again and yet once over again
That thou dost love me. . . . thou lovest! Who can fear . . . [roll—
Too many stars, though each in heaven shall Too many flowers, though each shall crown the year?
Say thou dost love me, love me, love me—toll
The silver itance!—only minding, dear,
To love me also in silence with thy soul.

A NOBLE HUSBAND, A TRUE WIFE AND A CHILD OF PROMISE

Naomi's responsive love did its best for Ruth in planning a worthy marriage for her. In the Orient, a prospective bride has too little say in the choice of a husband, which is wholly arranged by parents and guardians, but we go to the other extreme when giddy young people follow a transient fancy for each other into a life's union, against the protest of wise and loving parents. "Elopement," sounds romantic, but it is often tragic in its concluding acts. Certainly Ruth could not have selected for herself a better husband than Naomi picked for her. Rich as he was, it would have been a foolish choice had he not been also good. See him as he greets his reapers in the morning: "The Lord be with you." That was Capital's daily greeting to Labor. And Labor answered to Capital: "The Lord bless thee." The writer has often wished he were an artist and could paint that scene, and hang it on the walls of mills where to-day strikes and lockouts take the place of those kindly greetings. (There are places even to-day where boards of conciliation and a spirit of co-operation have displaced industrial wars). See also the philanthropy of Boaz, as he bids his reapers leave more of the grain as the portion of the poor, who, in the Orient, glean after the reapers—a work that Ruth did not spurn, and which suggests soul gleaning by those not called to the reapers' work.

And so Boaz and Ruth made another home of love, where there was soon developed what Lamartine calls the earthly trinity, "the father, the mother, and the child," the first of the circles of love of which the outermost are the love of God and of humanity.

WHAT WE GIVE UP, WHAT WE GAIN

Ruth had seemed to give up every thing for Naomi and Naomi's God. The sequel shows she really gained everything, as many have done in like case. Ruth's choice was like Moses' choice, "to suffer affliction with the people of God for a season." In Ruth's case it was also leaving her own people. But God in both cases was also choosing to give them eternal honor in both worlds as their "recompense of reward." "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

in her to prove she was quite human. It was probably a sin in her husband Elimelech, to move his family to Moab, a sin in which the wife may have shared, though women had little responsibility for family acts in that age. It was like Abraham fleeing from famine in Canaan to heathen Egypt, and like David fleeing from Saul to the Philistines, both of which acts showed distrust of God and brought new physical perils, with moral danger besides, and both of which God disapproved. And giving their sons to heathen wives was also a disobedience to God, which was mercifully overruled in Ruth's case for good. The deaths the family sought to

A THANKSGIVING SURPRISE

28 28

By MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

28 28

"WHAT are you going to do for Thanksgiving this year, mother?" asked Carter Ford, as he arose from the breakfast table and prepared to go to his work.

"Oh, I don't know; nothing, I guess. It's hardly worth while getting a turkey and going to a lot of fuss for just you and myself. Since your father died, and Elinor married and went away off to southern California, somehow I don't feel like making feasts or having frolics; it don't look proper, seems to me."

"I wish you wouldn't look at things in that way, mother," said Carter, fumbling among some papers in the old secretary. "Elinor is just where she wants to be, in a home of her own with the man she loves, and father is not dead, but living in heaven. I don't think it is right to sit and mope over our sorrows; that is not being sanctified by them, certainly. If you don't feel like being alone, suppose we reach out a little and make a dinner for some one besides ourselves, mother."

"Well, who, for pity's sake?" asked Mrs. Ford, irritably.

"Will you let me make out a list?" said the young man, taking a note-book from his breast-pocket and sitting down by the side of his mother. "I can get up a splendid little crowd if you say so. There's Ben Andrews; he hasn't a sign of a home, and he'd appreciate a dinner at ours beyond everything. And there's Kirby Lyndsay, our head clerk, and the two Roberts boys in my Sunday School class. I would like to ask them ever so much. And then there is Owen Mills in the express office; a poor, lonely, hard-working boy, more than three hundred miles from home. He never gets invited out, and nobody pays the least attention to him. It would be the greatest kindness, mother, to give these fellows one of your good dinners and a glimpse of home life."

"Why, of course, if you want to do a thing like that, I'll not put any obstacles in the way," sighed Mrs. Ford; "but it won't seem much like Thanksgiving with a lot of strangers in the house."

"All right, that's arranged for, then," said the young man briskly, jumping up and returning to the open secretary. "Now for my insurance papers. I was sure I had them in one of these drawers, and I want to take a look at them. I have an idea that the time is nearly run out. What is this, mother, tucked away in this little place all by itself? I never saw it before. Oh, I beg pardon. I'm sorry I said anything," for his mother had rushed forward, and seizing what he was holding in his hand so curiously, pressed it to her lips and covered it with a flood of tears.

It was a rude little plaything, fashioned out of a bit of soft pine wood. It was hard to tell what it was, but it had probably been designed for a boat. There was very little skill displayed in the carving, and the letters cut into the wood were shapeless things; they almost entirely encircled the boat and spelled "Mayflower." There was a little colored rag for a sail, and two tiny pine oars were fastened by means of pins to a strange looking figure in the middle, which, by stretching the imagination, one might make out to be intended for a man; but poor and homely and shapeless as was the toy, Mrs. Ford hugged it and kissed it and wept over it as if it had been a thing of life. Carter stood by in awkward sympathy.

"I do truly beg your pardon, mother," he said contritely. "I had no idea I was opening up the old wound. I had no right to meddle with what you have kept a tender secret. But I understand it all now; this is one of Harvey's boyish treasures, which you have cherished in memory of him. Don't take it so hard, mother, dear; he'll turn up again some time."

"Never, never," moaned poor Mrs. Ford, wiping her eyes with her kitchen apron; "he's been gone so many years, now, I've lost every ray of hope I ever had. And to think he went off as he did—so angry with everybody, and especially his father, and never let us know where he went."

"Suppose you tell me the whole story, mother. I was such a little fellow when Harvey went away, and I have always felt delicate about speaking of it; but now that the subject has come up, I should like to know the particulars."

"Well, it was nothing but a boyish prank in the start. Harvey was full of life and fun, and he and the other boys were always in mischief. I don't suppose they meant any harm, but they did lots of it, and were always getting punished for it by both parents and teachers. It was Hallowe'en, and your father, who fairly hated practical jokes, had strictly forbidden Harvey to go out on the street or to have anything to do in the way of

This queer little boat he made when he was only eight years old, and he called it the "Mayflower," and the man with the oars was his pilgrim. Poor Harvey! For his sake, Carter, invite your company, and I'll do the best I can for them. If we can do anybody any good, I suppose we ought to be willing to."

"That is the way I think the Master would have us look at it," said Carter, with a glance at his watch. "But I must be off; it is time now to open the store. I find that my insurance papers are all right, mother; the time is not out for two months yet, so don't worry. Good-bye," and the next moment the door closed behind the young man.

When Mr. Ford died two years previous, Carter succeeded to the business, and had carried it on successfully ever since. He

"All right. We've got a lot of stoves to take out to-day and your help will be welcome," was Carter's response.

A week passed, and the man who had given his name as James Bennet still remained. Carter had issued his invitations for Thanksgiving, but the day before the national holiday, seeing Bennet looking lonely and dispirited, he determined to include him with the rest.

"We are going to have a good, homely, old-fashioned dinner at our house, my mother and I," he said in his off-hand, friendly way; "I have invited some of the boys, and if you like to make one of us, we will give you a welcome."

No more was said until they were closing up for the night, then Carter remarked, as he put the key in his pocket: "I presume I will see you around at 126 Oak street to-morrow, Bennet?" and Bennet replied as heartily, "I'll be there!"

He did not come quite as soon as the others, but he came in time for the bountiful dinner, clad in his plain business suit, and with a beautiful bouquet of rare roses for Mrs. Ford, which delicate attention from a stranger put the little woman into a great flutter of excitement. "It makes me think of Harvey," she whispered to Carter, as she put them into a flower bowl, and set them in the centre of the handsome table. "He was forever and always bringing me flowers, especially roses; he knew I loved them so."

The dinner spread that day in the dining-room of the Fords was a true Thanksgiving one—a feast unto the Lord! Six lonely men, who were either homeless or whose homes were far away, sat down to as good and homey a dinner as a mother ever cooked.

After the dinner there was music. Carter seated himself at the piano, and gathered them all about him, and they sang heartily, all but the stranger, Bennet. He sat by and talked with Mrs. Ford, and watched her, from under his shaggy eyebrows, as she told stories of the olden time, and when, at last, they all withdrew, he held her hand the longest in parting, and thanked her earnestly and heartily.

The shadows of night had fallen and they had lit the gas, when the door-bell rang. Carter opened it and admitted—who? Not Bennet, surely, though the form looked strangely familiar. Oh no, not Bennet, for this man was smooth shaven, and instead of being clad in a plain business suit, wore a handsome suit of broadcloth. He did not introduce himself, but brushing by Carter, stood in the parlor door and stretched out a hand to Mrs. Ford.

"Mother," said he, "have you a welcome for me?"

"I'd have known you in a minute if you hadn't had those bushy whiskers!" exclaimed Mrs. Ford rapturously, after the first ecstatic greetings. "I told Carter you made me think of some one, and to think it was my very own boy. Oh, Harvey, what a Thanksgiving—and where have you been all these years?"

"All over the world. I have been within a hundred miles of you several times; but I could never make up my mind to return until this year, some way. I just settled on it all in a minute. Something seemed to be drawing me and I felt unusually homesick, so I thought I'd come back and see how the land lay. I thought I'd play the hard-up trick and beg for work, but I didn't know father was gone. I don't know, after all, whether I should have ventured to reveal myself if it hadn't been for this Thanksgiving dinner and a sight of the dear old home and mother's face. I saw you didn't know me, so I shaved off my whiskers. Mother, I've been a wicked fellow to leave you all these years, but—"

"Hush!" said Mrs. Ford with clasped hands and tear-dimmed eyes, "let's forget everything but that this is my Thanksgiving."

"HAVE YOU A WELCOME FOR ME?"

playing pranks; but Harvey, who was turned fifteen, thought he could do as he pleased, and slipped out accordingly and stayed out the whole night. We never knew it, for we supposed he had gone to bed, but in the morning we found he was in jail, together with a lot of others, for having pulled up a foot-bridge, causing a man to break his leg. It cost your father a good sum to get him out, and when he did, big fellow as he was, he got the most terrible whipping I ever knew your father to give him. Oh, it made him so angry!

"I shall never forget the scene we had, and he threatened to leave home. We had no idea he'd do it; but in the morning, sure enough, he was gone, and we have never heard from him since. Your father never liked anyone to speak of him, but I put away every little thing he ever made and cherished it; I couldn't help it, was young, but he was also bright and well educated, and possessed dignity and a great deal of business integrity, and his clerks not only respected his ability, but they loved the man. As he came in sight of the store that morning, and put his hand in his pocket for the key, he was surprised to see a man hovering about the door. He was plainly dressed, apparently about thirty years of age, and wore a heavy beard and a pair of very shaggy eyebrows that overshadowed his eyes. Carter stepped up to him.

"Is there anything I can do for you, sir?" he asked.

"If you would give me a bit of work or help me to it somewhere," said the man, swallowing the feelings that threatened to betray him. "I'm down on my luck. I'm good at anything that'll bring me bread and meat and a bed."

OUR COMPLETE COURSE IN... SHORTHAND

Isaac Pitman's 20th Century Revision

By Special Arrangement with Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, N. Y.

LESSON XXIV.

198. PHRASE OF THE.—The phrase of the may be expressed by writing the two words which it connects CLOSE TO EACH OTHER, and in this way indicating that one is "of the" other; thus, plan of the work, result of the measure, a statement of the actual condition of the country. The method of intimating of the cannot be mistaken in practice for this mode of expressing con- or com-. When of the is followed by con-, write the dot for con-; thus, close of the contest. These methods must not be employed after a dot or dash vowel sign, as a condensed account, two of the principal men, would not be distinct.

Exercise 66

Exercise 67

1. Clumped, jumped, dumped, stumped, lumped. 2. Consumption, exemption, coemption, pre-emption. 3. Lastly, wistful, waistcoat, postman, restless, tasteful. 4. Tincture, instinct, defunct, punctual, adjunct. 5. When the rights of men are considered, we are prompted to ask, What is the nature (of the) rule that men live under? 6. For the adjustment of affairs, laws of some kind exist, even among the most savage nations (of the) world. 7. From the operation of these the inhabitants cannot claim to be exempt. 8. But the rights (of the) man are judged by the privilege (of the) average man to share in the making (of the) laws. 9. Some favored countries enjoy a suffrage (of the) broadest kind, and all have a voice in the election (of the) head (of the) state, and in the framing (of the) constitution. 10. In other countries, such as the Celestial Empire, the people have no voice in the management (of the) state. 11. Under a despot there is a temptation to sweep away the power (of the) state if things go ill. 12. But under elective conditions all that happens is that the ministry (of the) day is deprived of its functions.

REVIEW

1. When may p. t. k. g. be omitted? 2. Write in the, for the, on the, with the, to the, at the, and the, from the, or the, but the, is the, as the. 3. How is the connective phrase of the indicated?

Contractions—Continued

199. Certain words of frequent occurrence are contracted by the omission of a portion of the outline:—

- (a) By employing the first two or three strokes of the outline only; thus, expect, expected.
(b) In most words ending in -action, -etion, etc., k may be omitted; thus, objection.
(c) In a few instances the medial consonant or syllable is omitted; thus, passenger.
(d) The hook n may be attached to words, where practicable, as a contraction for the following word than; thus, better than.

200. In the following list, contractions of a similar character and related words are grouped together; they can thus be conveniently learned in sections.

The student having advanced to this stage, is now advised to read some book printed in the Corresponding Style of shorthand, and we recommend for this purpose either of the following: Phonographic Reader or Select Readings No. 1, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand notes. Either of these works will be sent post-paid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orders should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XXV. will appear in the issue of Dec. 10.

Called Higher

At the good old age of eighty, Eben P. Davis, of Greendale, Mass., went to the "Father's House" above. A hard worker in the Methodist Church and Sunday School, serving as musical director without salary, a kind neighbor, a good husband, he laid down a life of usefulness and beauty when he fell asleep in Jesus to awake "with his likeness," writes one who knew him, adding: "He was long a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family; so this message is sent."

In the passing away of Mr. Hardy G. Hooker, of Woods, Texas, the poor lost a friend, the needy a helper, the missionary cause a faithful supporter, and the church a pillar; his neighbors (and he called those who had need of him, even in distant States, his neighbors) miss him. None ever sought him asking aid to be turned away empty-handed. People came from rural districts and all the towns around to pay the last tribute of respect to this man of God, who lay in state like some great official; old, fleecy-headed negroes, weeping for their ex-master and benefactor, were of those who gathered around his bier; and there were little children to tell how "Uncle Hardy" was always granting them favors.

Mrs. J. F. Kerr, Salida, Calif., writes: "My dear husband was ready for his summons when he heard the Master's call to come up higher. His faith in his Saviour was simple and complete. He was a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family and looked eagerly for its visit every week. When the last Art Portfolio came, he was so pleased with it, that he selected two for his own, hanging the Madonna on his wall. In his name, I thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the pleasure and comfort the paper gave him."

An Education in Art

Ivers & Pond PIANOS.

Colonial Renaissance.

Our new style 231 shown above is regarded by experts as the most dainty and in every way the most charming and delightful upright that we ever made. This Piano was designed by a famous artist, and combines most effectively the colonial simplicity of the 17th century with the more ornate and exquisite decoration of the 20th century. From a musical standpoint this model cannot be excelled. No amount of money could buy any better materials or workmanship, richer or more musical tone, or greater durability.

A catalogue picturing our Colonial Renaissance, Classic, Louis XV. and other beautiful designs, each a gem in its kind, mailed free on request.

HOW TO BUY.

Wherever in the United States no dealer sells them, we send Ivers & Pond Pianos on trial at our risk. If the Piano fails to please, it returns at our expense for railway freights both ways. May we send you our catalogue (free), quote lowest prices, and explain our unique easy-pay plans? We can thus practically bring Boston's largest piano establishment to your door, though it be in the smallest and most remote village in the country. Write us to-day.

THE HOME FOR THE FRIENDLESS, NEW YORK CITY

MISS GOULD'S GIFT TO THE CHILDREN

IN the presence of nearly a thousand well-known New York men and women, the new Home for the Friendless was formally dedicated a few days ago. It is situated at Woodycrest avenue and One Hundred and Sixty-first street, New York, and the building itself has a frontage of about one hundred feet and a proportionate depth. Miss Helen Gould, whose benefactions have already made her known to many lovers of good works everywhere, generously defrayed the cost of erection, and also of fitting up the playrooms, and providing woodworking equipments in the kindergarten department. Mrs. Joseph Millbrook, Mrs. William Dwyer, Mr. William B. Tuthill and Mr.

Theodore B. Starr, also gave valuable aid to the enterprise. The building is four stories, brick, trimmed with stone, and is in the centre of a park of five acres. On the first floor of the building are the offices and recitation rooms; second floor, boys' playrooms, dormitories and class rooms; third floor, the girls' playrooms, dormitories and a general gymnasium; fourth floor, general workshop for kindergarten work. One part of the Home will be used as a Quarantine Ward, where all new arrivals will be kept two weeks, at first, to avert possible contagion. On the top floor is a large glass-walled "sun room," which will be used for the weaker children and invalids.

The Pilgrimage of the Doukhobors

Came the news that the Doukhobors had been seized with a religious frenzy, and were mobilizing, to march on Winnipeg, where they were going "to find Christ," and "to Christianize the world."

Towards the end of October, more than a thousand of these peasants arrived at Doukhobors at Yorkton. Many of the women were ill; the little children they had carried in their arms were dying from need of nourishment. It was because of this, more than anything else, that they were persuaded to leave their husbands and return home. The sympathetic farmers provided the men with money and clothes, but no sooner had they recommenced their march through the slush and snow than they again discarded everything but their cotton garments. Half clothed, with unkempt beards, disheveled hair and bloodshot eyes, singing their wild chants, they continued onwards over the prairie, following the line of the railroad. For the most part, it seemed, they fasted, and went even without sleep. Instructions were given to the railroad conductors to keep a sharp look out for them at night. From the trains they could be seen starting up from the ground, where they lay, or standing stoically with folded arms, as if in prayer. When asked where they were going, they answered, "We do not know. We go wherever the Spirit tells us to go. We are looking for Jesus." Persuasion having failed to turn them from their fanatical purpose, the Government gave instructions that they were to be stopped by force, and, if necessary, carried to their homes.

On page 979, appears the portrait of "Grandmother" Verigin, wife of the great leader now in Siberia. On her right, is Mrs. Eliza Varney, a Quakeress, who has labored among the Doukhobors. Ivan Mahostoff and Simon Ziboff are two of the leaders of the strange sect.

From the Gideons' President

Dear Christian Herald:—Your production of the story of the Gideons has already borne fruit in the life of one man that I know of. I wish personally, and for our organization, to thank you for publishing this story. Our work is enlarging rapidly and is daily becoming more interesting.

Yorkton, in Assiniboia. They moved over the prairie like a black cloud. They reached the town in a pitiable condition, owing to the hardships of the march and the inclemency of the weather. They were half starved, owing to the difficulty of obtaining a sufficiency of vegetable diet; and those whose rubber shoes had worn out were forced to travel over the rough roads in bare feet. But in spite of everything, they remained cheerful; they sang psalms to the glory of God as they marched along.

The World's Best Music

If there is a piano in your home you are constantly buying sheet music—and paying high prices for it. It lies in ragged piles around the house and becomes scattered and torn. You lose money by buying music in that way, to say nothing of your loss of time and temper when searching for a particular selection. Why not buy your music in volumes, filled with the best selections, and thoroughly indexed? The "Library of the World's Best Music" is designed for your needs. Its eight volumes—sheet music size, but light and easy to handle—are crowded with the best vocal and instrumental music, carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors. If you were to buy the music it contains, one piece at a time, it would cost you over $200.00. Through our Musical Library Club—for a limited time—the entire set will cost you one-tenth of that amount, and you can pay it in little payments of

$1.00 a Month

The sets are in eight large volumes, 9 x 12 inches in size, attractively bound in half-leather or cloth. By means of an ingenious device in binding, the volumes open flat at the piano and remain open. A set contains over 400 illustrations, including numerous chromatic art plates, printed in ten to twelve colors. There are 2,200 pages of sheet music in the entire library.

IF YOU ARE A PIANIST you will find this collection of music invaluable. It contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. Such composers are represented as Paderewski, Gounod, Sullivan, Mascagni, Wagner, Mozart, Balfe and Liszt.

IF YOU LIKE MUSIC but do not play yourself, you cannot make a better present to your wife or daughter than a set of this musical library. It means evening after evening of pleasure, for it furnishes in the most compact and simple form all the world's greatest music. This collection is to music what the encyclopedia is to knowledge—the best of all properly proportioned.

IF YOU ARE A SINGER the "World's Best Music" will increase your repertoire. It will place in your hands 400 of the best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets, arranged for all voices and for piano accompaniment. The collection embraces all the old songs of your childhood days, besides the new and popular melodies of the last few years.

IF YOU ARE A STUDENT of music, you will find this library more than half a musical education. The selections have been made by Reginald De Koven, Victor Herbert, Helen Kendrick Johnson, Gerrit Smith and others equally well-known in the musical world. As a musical encyclopedia it is unequalled, as it contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits.

Our Special Half-Price Offer!

Our Musical Library Club has secured an entirely new edition of the "World's Best Music" at a price slightly above the cost of paper and printing. On this account we are able to offer these sets at about one-half the regular prices—payable $1 a month. Through the Musical Library Club—direct from the publisher to the customer—you can secure a set for $21.00 in cloth binding and $25.00 for the half-leather. These sets were previously sold for $35.00 and $40.00. The edition is small, so, to avoid disappointment in failing to secure a set, cut off the coupon to-day, sign it, and mail it to us. We will then send you a set (express paid by us) for examination and use. After five days' examination, if you are not satisfied, return the books to us at our expense. But, if you decide to keep the set, send us $1.00 at the expiration of five days, and $1.00 a month thereafter until the full amount is paid.

BOOKCASE FREE—We have a small number of elegant oakwood bookcases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a bookcase free with your set it will be necessary to send us your order before December 12th. If your order is received after that date we cannot supply a bookcase with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This bookcase is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

SALESMEN'S TRIALS.

Bad Food is One of Them.

Road traveling is rather hard on salesmen. Irregular hours, indifferent hotels and badly cooked food play smash with their digestion. An old Philadelphia traveler tells how he got the start of his troubles by using Grape-Nuts. "For years I was troubled with a bad stomach, which gave me constant headaches and pains all through my body, caused by eating improper food. I spent considerable money on doctors, who said I had indigestion, and after taking medicine for a year and it doing me no good, I decided to go on a diet, but the different cereals I ate did not help me. If it hadn't been for the advice of a friend to try Grape-Nuts, I might be ailing yet."

I commenced to feel better in a short time after using the food; my indigestion left me; stomach regained its tone so that I could eat anything, and headaches stopped. I have gained in weight, and have a better complexion than I had for years. At many hotels, the salesmen will have nothing in the line of cereals but Grape-Nuts, as they consider it not only delicious, but also beneficial for their health in the life they lead." A College Course at Home

COURSE III.—Advanced Elementary Course

Outlined by AUGUSTUS S. DOWNING, A. M.,
Principal of the New York Training School for Teachers, New York City

THE following course of Home Study is modeled to a large extent on the regular High School course—the books recommended are selected from those officially approved of by the New York Board of Education. The course is intended as a practical guide to those who are ambitious to learn but cannot afford to go to school, and the books mentioned are such as to awaken intelligent interest in their study

The Subjects

The Student must decide for himself whether to devote his entire time to one subject or whether to take up several simultaneously. A regular plan of study is suggested as a guide to those who prefer to adopt the latter course. The inclusion of Algebra and Geometry, however, does not mean that they must necessarily form part of the educational course; and the time given to these subjects may, at the option of the student, be occupied by further study in English and History, or to arithmetic and geography if his knowledge of these is deficient.

The following are the subjects suggested to give the student a good foundation of education:

English, Literature and Grammar; Arithmetic; Geography; United States, Ancient, and English History; Botany and Zoology; Physiology; Astronomy; Physics and Civil Government.

For those who have the inclination: Algebra and Plane Geometry.

Hours of Study

It cannot be too often repeated that those whose studies are taken up in addition to a full day's employment should not attempt more than two hours a day of study—say forty minutes in the morning and twice that period in the evening. A great deal can be accomplished in even less time than this by the judicious use of odd moments. But when such a course is possible, it will be found of great advantage to lay out a regular plan of study and to follow it as closely as circumstances will permit.

A CONVENIENT PLAN FOR A YEAR'S WORK

40 Minutes for Each Subject:

| | 1st Six Months | | | 2d Six Months | | |
|-----------|-----------------|------------|------------|------------------|-----------|---------|
| MONDAY | Eng. Grammar | Arithmetic | History | Eng. Literature | Botany | History |
| TUESDAY | Eng. Literature | Geography | Physiology | Eng. Literature | Astronomy | History |
| WEDNESDAY | Eng. Grammar | Arithmetic | History | Civil Government | Physics | History |
| THURSDAY | Eng. Literature | Geography | Zoology | Eng. Literature | Botany | History |
| FRIDAY | Eng. Grammar | Arithmetic | History | Civil Government | Astronomy | History |
| SATURDAY | Recreation | | | Recreation | | |
| SUNDAY | Rest | | | Rest | | |

The course above outlined could be thoroughly covered with the use of the following list of text-books. In many cases the names of several books are given, any one of which will be found thoroughly practical and would serve the purpose of the student. Not more than one book on any subject should be studied at a time; others can be bought or borrowed as the student finds himself ready to take them up.

Text-books Suggested.

English Grammar, etc.

Baskerville & Sewell's English Grammar. (American Book Co., New York.)
Lewis' First Book in English Writing. (The Macmillan Co., New York); or Maxwell & Smith's Writing in English. (American Book Co., New York); or Maxwell & Johnston's School Composition. (American Book Co., New York.)
Scott & Denney's Composition—Rhetoric. (Allan & Bacon, New York.)

English Literature.

Macaulay's Essays on Addison, Milton and Johnson.
Tennyson's Poems on The Coming of Arthur and other Idylls of the King; Enoch Arden; The Princess.

Shakespeare's Julius Caesar; Macbeth; Merchant of Venice; A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield.
Milton's Paradise Lost, Books I. and II.
Scott's Ivanhoe; Marmion; Lady of the Lake.
George Eliot's Silas Marner.
Burke's Speech on Conciliation with America.
Irving's Sketchbook.
Homer's Odyssey (translated).
Dickens' Christmas Carol and Cricket on the Hearth.

Thackeray's Henry Esmond.
Southey's Life of Nelson.
Pancost's History of American Literature. (Henry Holt & Co., New York.)

Katherine Lee Bates' American Literature. (The Macmillan Co., New York.)

Algebra and Plane Geometry

Fisher & Schwatt's Algebra. (The Macmillan Co., New York.)
Wentworth's Geometry. (Ginn & Co., New York.)

Arithmetic

Wentworth's Practical Arithmetic. (Ginn & Co., New York.)

Geography

Tarr & McMurry's North America and Europe. (The Macmillan Co., New York.)

Astronomy

Young's Lessons in Astronomy. (Ginn & Co., New York.)

If on taking up the course you need any further suggestions or advice, we shall be pleased to help you. Address CHRISTIAN HERALD, Educational Department, Bible House, New York.

Botany.

Allen's Stories of the Plants. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Bergen's Elements of Botany. (Ginn & Co., New York); or Coulter's Plant Relations. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Dana's Common Wild Flowers, and How to Know Them. (American Book Co., New York.)

Our Native Trees. (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York); or Familiar Trees and Their Leaves. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Gray's School and Field Book of Botany (American Book Co.) is a very technically scientific book and greater satisfaction will at first be derived by using one of the other books mentioned; but for the serious student no book can take the place of Gray's.

Zoology.

Jordan's Animal Life. (D. Appleton & Co., New York); or Davenport's Introduction to Zoology. (The Macmillan Co., New York.)

Physics.

Henderson & Woodhull's Elements of Physics. (D. Appleton & Co., New York); or Avery's School Physics. (Butler, Sheldon & Co., New York.)

History.

Myer's Rome. (Ginn & Co., New York.)
Myer's Greece. (Ginn & Co., New York.)
Green's Short History of the English People. (American Book Co., New York.)

McLoughlin's History of the American Nation. (D. Appleton & Co., New York); or Parkman's History of the United States (Little, Brown & Co., Boston), is a work of many volumes; but those who wish to awaken in themselves true historic interest, should by all means study it at some library.

Civil Government

Fiske's Civil Government. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.)

Physiology.

Hutchinson's Physiology and Hygiene. (Maynard, Merrill & Co., New York.)

Answers to Question of the Week

In a case where the father and mother belong to different religious denominations, which of the two shall decide the denomination of the children?

"The Father Should Decide"

The father, as head of the family, should decide. Even if the children do not rely on his judgment, as on their mother's, in general matters, or though he has not adorned his profession in his household, still the mother gives the children valuable lessons in orderly and Christian living by cheerfully deferring to him, but, at no time, concealing that there is a difference in opinion. But when a question of authority arises, the weight should lie with the father. CORA CARPENTER.

A Good Example to Follow

A lady who belonged to a different church from that of her husband used to go with him one Sunday and he with her the next; but after a few years of this alternate attendance, joined the church to which he belonged, saying she could no longer bear to hear their children talking about "papa's church" and "mamma's church." She justly feared they would become deeply attached to neither, and never cast in their lot with any, thus suffering incalculable loss. All wives in similar cases might well follow her example, unless the husband have the grace to be first in concession. This, of course, applies to the evangelical churches, which on essential points are so agreed that no violence need be done to conscience in leaving one denomination for another. As to which parent shall go with the other, this might be settled by considering which is easier of access; or, which one has greater need of help; or, which one is likelier to promote the spiritual interests of the children. AMELIA HOYT.

The Mother the Guide of Childhood.

From birth through childhood, until the opening mind begins to think for itself, the child has, as a constant companion, confidant and confessor, the mother. From her lips it receives its first instruction, and learns the distinction between right and wrong. She it is who implants in the tender mind its first impressions of God, of the little Babe Jesus, of heaven and the holy angels. It is by Divine ordination that the mother is thus made the child's earliest teacher, and that ordination does not always cease even with childhood, for it very often continues through young manhood and womanhood. As the mother has charge of the early moral and physical welfare of the child, the question of denomination should not be introduced until the child is old enough to decide for itself. Let it go to church with each parent in turn, and let it freely and without compulsion of any sort, choose between the two. But wise parents will bury their own differences and worship together at the same altar, so that the vexed question of different denominations may not arise. MARIA AYLMEY.

The Mother, the Safer Guide

The mother has the direction of the minds of the children more in her hands than the father, and she usually, though not necessarily, devotes herself more carefully and continuously to their religious training. For these reasons, she is better qualified and has a better right to direct their religious future than the father. However, the father is the legal head of the family, and the happiness of the family and the religious usefulness of the children are likely to depend very much upon his acquiescence in the matter. B. F. WHITEMORE.

Mutual Concessions Needed

It should be settled, like many other serious differences between husband and wife, by a mutual concession, and affectionate regard for each other's happiness and the highest welfare of their children. One would naturally expect the wife and children to pay deference to the will of the father, he being the head of the household, though the mother's influence is usually the stronger and more permanent upon the intellectual and spiritual life of the children. But the father ought, by conscientious precept and worthy example, lead the family in matters of religious life. To do his full duty here will win their undying affection, the confidence and respect of society and the favor of God. Even where there is a conflict of strong moral conviction, the peace of the household demands acquiescence to what cannot be overcome, and the one who graciously yields is the most generous. WALTER W. HUBBARD.

The Mother First, the Child Afterward

When parents belong to churches of different denominations, it is the mother's privilege to say what church the children should attend. It is the mother who trains the child from its youth up, and she, therefore, has a right to determine the religious training of her offspring. The father, however, should be consulted in this matter, and, if possible, secure his good will and co-operation. After they have reached more mature years, let them choose for themselves what they believe to be right. CHAS. E. BYERLEY.

They Will Decide for Themselves

This is a question which has been very fruitful of trouble in Christian families, and yet it is of comparatively little importance. So that the children have a good religious training and are inculcated with principles of honesty and truth, it matters little with which church they unite. Above all, parents should never wrangle over this question. Give your children, when young, the simple religious training which was all-sufficient for the humble fishermen of Galilee, the chosen followers of Christ. Teach them to be truthful, faithful and forgiving, and when they are of proper age, allow them to decide for themselves to which religious denomination they will belong. EVA E. PETTIT.

The Mother's Potent Influence

The mother is the potent instrument of power over her children. The first impression made upon the infant mind is stamped there by the mother; hence the stage of impres-sibility is begun by her, and deepens with the growth of the child. Therefore she is the one best fitted to decide, if a true Christian. God has appointed to motherhood the greater responsibility and blessedness of moulding the youthful mind. An angel's work is not more exalted.

ZURA B.

"Leave the Child Free"

No one should enter the "household of faith" but those who come of their own free will. When parents are convinced their children desire to receive Christ in their hearts, they should be encouraged to make the "open confession," but by all that is holy, and that will make for the child's earthly and eternal happiness and usefulness, leave the child free, and do nothing that will increase denominational bigotry and wrangling. Then, when the child sees proper, let him join that denomination whose peculiar tenets he can support.

J. G. DAVIS.

The Father Naturally Should Control

All things else being equal, the father, as head of his household, should have the unquestionable right to control his children. This seems to have been the Divine arrangement when God entered into covenant relations with our patriarchal fathers of the old dispensation; for in Gen. 18:18, he says of Abraham: "For I know that he will command his children and household after him." Our "latter day" fathers, however, are not all like "faithful Abraham," and, therefore, forfeit their birthright, and cannot claim its privileges. As example is always a more potent teacher than precept, I would plead for the parent who will take the child by the hand and say, "Come with me to the house of the Lord," rather than for the one who would command, "Go thou, my son, to the house of God." In other words, the parent whose life best accords with and emphasizes his or her teaching, is the surest guide for the little ones.

Miscellaneous Questions

Jennie R., Plainfield, N. J. In what States do women enjoy the right of suffrage?

In Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Idaho, they are fully enfranchised. In Kansas they have municipal suffrage. In Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oregon, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, Wisconsin, Arizona and Oklahoma Territory they have limited suffrage, and can vote for trustees, directors, etc.

C. M., Hiawatha, Kan. Is it wrong for a consecrated Christian to play any kind of instrumental music for the pleasure of their friends?

"Any kind" is almost too indefinite. We could not imagine a Christian playing certain kinds of music, which are associated with low or vulgar sentiment. It would seem to us that the whole field of music is open to any player of taste and skill, and that such a player will find no difficulty in distinguishing good music from bad, the objectionable from the unobjectionable. Leading musicians assure us that there is in music, as in painting and literature, a line where propriety ends and where the vicious or sensuous dominates. We think the latter characterization should include the modern dance music, rag-time, coon song and similar rubbish, which are mostly the very doggerel of sounds.

S. S. Teacher, Scranton, Pa. In my Sunday School class is a boy, whose father, I believe, is a free thinker. The boy, under his father's prompting, challenges a remark I made recently, that acquaintance with the Bible is essential to a good moral life. Was I not right?

We expect good moral lives from those who study the Bible, and probably if those who are leading good moral lives could be counted, it would be found that the vast majority are Bible readers. That is the natural effect of the book. We doubt, however, whether you could substantiate your assertion that acquaintance with it is essential, that is, that there could be no morality without it. Doubtless there were persons leading moral lives before the Bible was written, and certainly before all of it was written. In our own day, those who habitually and wilfully neglect the book miss the best help they could have to moral living.

M. C. B., Simcoe, Ont. What did Christ mean by his reply to John the Baptist (Matt. 3:15) "Suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness"?

Although Christ had no sins of which to repent, he submitted to the baptism of repentance, because he wished to represent his people in all things. "He was numbered with the transgressors," and took upon him the human nature with its humiliation. He took his place under the law, and showed by his example the way to fulfillment of righteousness. Repentance and renunciation of sin, typified by baptism, were to be the keystone of his ministry. John saw that the rite was not needed in the case of Jesus, but Jesus insisted that he might endorse John's ministry.

We have received a letter from a correspondent, who signs himself "Historian," who wishes us to settle a dispute by stating how often Paris has been taken by the Germans. Well, the answer might be once or twice, according to the way you look at the facts. The allies, many of whom were Germans, occupied Paris from July 7, 1815, to the end of 1818; but it was in 1871 that Paris was actually taken by the Germans. It was occupied by them from March 1 to March 3.

W. S. R., Shawville, Penna. Is it not inconsistent for professors of the religion of Jesus Christ to pray for the abolition of the rum traffic, and then vote for men who enact laws to sustain the same?

We do not believe any Christian would knowingly support a man who was an open and avowed advocate of the liquor traffic. If he did so, it would probably be because he did not comprehend the full meaning of his action. On the other hand, there are doubtless men not specially pronounced in that particular question whom he may conscientiously consider entitled to his support on other grounds.

A. L. A. The House of Representatives has fewer members than the Lower Houses of England, France, Spain, Hungary, Austria, or Germany.

Inquirer. There is no school in Europe devoted to the education of princesses. Perhaps you are thinking of the institution at Bangkok, in Siam, where many members of the royal family receive their instruction. This school is presided over by an Englishwoman, who is responsible for the intellectual and physical development of her boarders—fifteen little princesses—who are constantly under her charge, except from Friday to Monday, when they are permitted to return home.

A Book for Women

In the "Hall of Fame" on University Heights, New York, there are as yet no women's names inscribed. But THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's beautiful premium book, The Hall of Fame, relates the career of some notable women who, in future elections, may most worthily be chosen to appear there, twenty of these having been nominated by a large number of people when a recent ballot was held among readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Educators, reformers, artists, authors, and mothers find representation in the list. Child, maiden, or matron could hardly discover more inspiring tribute on her table when she wakes up on Christmas morning than The Hall of Fame. This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

A Mother's Testimony

"I have a son, a prominent lawyer," a pious mother writes, "who used to learn Bible texts at my knee. Of late years, he lost all interest, save that of an intellectual nature, in God's Word. 'Common law,' he says, 'is based on the Ten Commandments, and a lawyer ought to know his Bible.' That's the only way he looked at it. I did not argue or urge other regard, for, as a simple woman, knowing God's Word is true because I've tried it, I didn't know what to say. I just prayed. When my Red Letter Testament came, I wanted to keep it very much, I loved it so. But I wrote on the flyleaf: 'My dear boy; for mother's sake, please read the words in red, just as if the Lord were saying them to you. Try it one year. This is not for a lawyer; it is for the little boy who used to say his prayers at my knee. Mother.' Two months ago he was converted. 'Mother,' he said, 'the little red texts began the work, the revival only finished it.' The Red Letter Testament, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $1.85.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

By Sarah Burnwell Elliott.

Read this story in the home of the world. The story is told in a simple, plain, and direct manner, and is full of interest and pathos. It is a story of a boy who was born in a poor, cold, and lonely place, but who, through the love and kindness of a good man, found a home and a father. The story is full of beautiful illustrations, and is a most interesting and profitable reading.

The Art of Being Thankful

TOO few people understand the art of being thankful. The truth is, you cannot give evidence of gratitude in an affected manner. Something has been done for you. Very well, you must let it be seen exactly what this thing done for you, means to you. Mere formal expressions of thanks mean nothing. Find some way to show your gratitude, instead of wasting time talking about it.

I do not mean that expressions of thanks are to be neglected—they are important as a formality. One would say that most people find this formality formidable. A man once told me that his pleasure in receiving a present was entirely spoiled by the thought of the ordeal he would have to face in thanking the donor. This sensation is not uncommon. To choose the right words in which to express thanks is very difficult. Rather, I would say, it is made difficult. Study in this matter to be simple. Ask yourself, "What do I feel?" Instead of trying to compose an elaborate expression of gratitude, find out in what your real pleasure lies. Your own question you will answer, not in any finely wrought sentence, but in a few words. It is these words that are required to give utterance to the emotion of your heart.

But, above all, learn to show your gratitude. A great many people, when they have received any favor or benefit, look upon it as a debt to be paid off. Thereupon do they set aside and destroy that inexpressible charm that formed, as it were, the very perfume and essence of the gift.

Gifts there may be whose purpose is to create or establish an obligation; such mercenary transactions or ultimate exchanges, we are not here considering. All true gifts require in return no compensation, but the exquisite pleasure of knowing that they have thrown upon something that was dark, light, or added a new radiance to the heart of another.

Love is the highest gratitude. The responses of gratitude are conceived by love; instead of something necessary, they are something that cannot be helped. The flower gives back nothing to the sun for its warmth; but it lifts and turns its head sunwards with gentle gratitude. My friend gives me a house with a beautiful garden; in return, I gather the first roses that bloom and take them to him. Wherein is no paying back or assertion of independence, but a tribute, such as one heart pays to another that it loves.

It is an old saying that the more you do for a person the more they expect of you. I do not think this is ingratitude. Sometimes I go into the woods, taking with me nuts to feed the squirrels, who have learned to know me, and appear hurriedly from the trees at the sound of my footsteps in the fallen leaves. Each squirrel taking its nut to bury in some secret store comes back again, and because of this eager coming back I am pleased. Should one go off and not return, I should call him an ungrateful fellow. Only when my supply is done, I expect no chattering or complaining, nor do I find it. The hand that feeds them is in no danger of being bitten.

In all "coming back," there is, at all events, the appearance of gratitude. Who has done you a good turn once is rewarded if he can do you a good turn a second time.

The real meaning of gratitude is gladness. A radiant face gives thanks better than mumbled words. "A golden text," says Emerson, "is that which I so admire in the Buddhist who never thanks, and says, 'Do not flatter your benefactor.'"

Make no nuisance of your gratitude. A kind action does not need to be waved constantly in the face of him who performed it. When this is done it becomes an embarrassment; very likely becomes a barrier.

Gifts and gratitude should ebb and flow like tidal waters, making no kind of stir or burly.

Gratitude is not to be expressed in any off-hand or ordinary manner. For your Thanksgiving you shall need all that is best and finest in your nature.

"He is a good man," says a great writer, "who can receive a gift well."

How good are you? How well are you receiving your gifts or blessings?

It is this question you should ask yourself on Thanksgiving Day, in a frank, open way, wanting to find out; not glossing over.

Your thoughts, your words, your deeds, that is to say, your character, this is the supreme thank-offering.

Take a lesson from the fields, which, in return for the summer rain, burst into flower. In the manner in which you receive your gifts, and give them out again for the good of others, do you show your gratitude to God.

The transformation must be of your own doing. It shall make you humble, sympathetic, kind, helpful—in a word, godlike.

Will YOU Help Dress These Dolls?

MRS. SARAH J. BIRD, whose noble work among the East Side poor in New York is known everywhere, makes this appeal to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Dear Dr. Klopsch:

It seems necessary to begin our work for the Bowery Mission "Christmas Tree" long in advance, that we may get our five hundred dolls dressed. We find nothing pleases the little girls as much as a doll, for the mother-spirit fills the heart of even these little street waifs; and as I go to and from the Mission, they cling to my skirts, and with beseeching words beg for a "Bowery Mission doll."

Do you think that I may venture to go forward and buy these dolls, with full assurance that the needed money will be sent, as usual, by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? We have always provided some little gift for 1,200 such children as live in the attics and cellars surrounding our Mission. If these kind-hearted men and women could catch a glimpse of the eager, anxious little faces that stand from early morning (kept in line by the police) until two in the afternoon on Christmas, waiting for our door to open, and then see the sudden change in their faces—the painful anxiety is gone, and as they get one look at that Christmas tree, their faces beam with joy that knows no bounds, for the tree is so laden with beautiful toys that, as one little girl said, "I guess I'm dreaming, but I ain't asleep." Well, as I said, if they could imagine the scene in the Bowery Mission, we should have more money sent in than we would be willing to use for the "joy of a day."

Shall Mrs. Bird have her five hundred dolls all dressed and ready for the wonderful tree that is to gladden the hearts of the little East Side girl waifs at Christmas time? We believe her plea for the children should not go unanswered. All who wish to help her in this beautiful work, should send their contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

A TUG OF WAR. Coffee Puts Up a Grand Fight.

Among the best of judges of good things in the food line, is the groceryman or his wife. They know why many of their customers purchase certain foods.

The wife of a groceryman in Carthage, New York, says: "I have always been a lover of coffee, and therefore drank a great deal of it. About a year and a half ago, I became convinced that it was the cause of my headaches and torpid liver, and resolved to give it up, although the resolution caused me no small struggle, but Postum came to the rescue. From that time on, coffee has never found a place on our table, except for company, and then we always feel a dull headache throughout the day for having indulged."

When I gave up coffee and commenced the use of Postum I was an habitual sufferer from headache. I now find myself entirely free from it, and what is more, have regained my clear complexion which I had supposed was gone forever.

I never lose an opportunity to speak in favor of Postum, and have induced many families to give it a trial, and they are invariably pleased with it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE SOULLESS PRAYER

I DO not like to hear him pray
On bended knee, about an hour,
For grace to spend aright the day,
Who knows his neighbor has no flour.

I'd rather see him go to mill
And buy the luckless brother bread;
And see his children eat their fill,
And laugh, beneath their humble shed.

I do not like to hear him pray:
"Let blessings on the widow be"
Who never seeks her home, to say:
"If want o'ertakes you, come to me."

I hate the prayer, so loud and long,
That's offered for the orphan's weal,
By him who sees him crushed with wrong,
And only with the lips doth feel.

I do not like to hear her pray,
With jeweled ear and silken dress,
Whose washerwoman toils all day,
And then is asked to work for less.

Such pious falsehoods I despise!
The folded hands, the face demure,
Of those, with sanctimonious eyes,
Who steal the earnings of the poor.

I do not like such soulless prayers!
If wrong, I hope to be forgiven.
Such prayers no angel upward bears—
They're lost, a million miles from heaven.

The Story of a Church Window

FIVE years ago, the great fire in Market Street, Philadelphia, threatened the store of John Wanamaker. The danger, however, was averted by the coolness and bravery of his employees, who mounted the roof and fought the incoming flames with such effect that the building was untouched. As a thanksgiving offering, Mr. Wanamaker decided to erect a church in a neighbourhood where many of his employees reside. To the building is attached a library, a reading room, and a gymnasium, and the building is dedicated to Dr. John Chambers, the pastor of his youth, the man whose wonderful preaching drew crowds of young men to the old church on South Broad street.

A portrait of Dr. Chambers is placed in one of the windows of the church library, and there is a life-like radiance about this glass portrait that could hardly have been obtained on canvas.

For the Composition Writer

In efforts to produce a work of value to the orator and essayist of maturer years by providing a fund of anecdote upon which he can draw at will, the author of The Speaking Oak did not forget the schoolboy and school-girl, whose composition is in their eyes quite as important as the article or address of the grown-up person, even though he be a Congressman, is in his. Few subjects can be given the earnest little man or woman toiling bravely along over facts, scratch-pads and pencils, but may be happily illustrated by a neat story done over in the writer's own words or honestly quoted as rules governing his proceedings may determine. The Speaking Oak is a treasury of anecdotes—historical, social, mythological—placed freely at his service by this journal; the intent from inception being to serve the youthful author's convenience. The stories may sometimes suggest topics when choice is left the scholar. This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

Church Choir Sonophone Band

WHAT USERS OF SONOPHONE CORNETS SAY

Mr. C. W. DICK, President of Hallow Presbyterian Church, 123th St. and 4th Ave., New York City, says: I have used the "Sonophone Cornet" am much pleased with them. It is quite surprising to find these instruments of such variety of good work. They are certainly invaluable for Church entertainments.

Mrs. J. VOX ROSS, Organist and Choir Leader of M. E. Church, 80 East 116th St., New York City, says: I have used the "Sonophone Cornet" with great success. It was a big surprise and unlooked for at the concert.

Mr. ED S. LYNCH, Sunday School Superintendent of Episcopal Church of Canton St., says: For a money-making feature for Church purposes, the "Sonophone Cornet" is the best I ever tried, and I predict a big future for it amongst Churches without a paid choir.

The cost of spare reeds is very low, and the instrument is so simple that any one can play it.

YOU CAN PLAY IT—IF YOU CAN TALK

No training or tedious practice. It is mastered in a few moments by any man, woman, or child, nothing like it ever before produced. The Sonophone principle converts the voice into a musical instrument of brilliant quality and fine tone, (phone) part acts as a sounding board, and allows the player to produce effects from the softest to the loudest tones. It calls forth hidden beauties from the world of sounds and opens a new realm in the musical world.

A GRAND PIPE ORGAN EFFECT CAN BE OBTAINED with a "Church Choir Sonophone" Quartette. Every Church in the United States, without a paid choir, should organize Church Choir Band as a means of earning money for Church purposes, and render "Sonophone Concerts" as they invariably draw full houses. To you, personally, the cornet affords unlimited pleasure in your home, as you can play it with telling effect without the aid of other instruments. It is an excellent accompaniment as it blends beautifully with the piano, organ, or any string instrument.

69c. SPECIAL 30 DAY OFFER. To introduce the Musical Marvel, and to give you a chance to test our instrument, and prove all our claims, we will send the SONOPHONE CORNET, metal brass, finished, highly polished, 12 inches long, 6 inch bell, with instructions how to play, by mail postpaid to 69c. We make this extraordinary offer believing that all interested will organize concerts. This is a grand offer and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, post office money order, a bank draft payable to our order.

were only just entering the Master's kindergarten. The life of progress is the only life." When asked to give to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with whom, through its pages, she comes in close touch during the year ahead, an account of how she was led into the Master's service, she said:

"When a girl, I was very gay, and found my pleasures outside my church, my duties within. My father was a prominent citizen of Brooklyn; he was kind and indulgent, and I had about everything I wanted. I joined the Methodist Church at fourteen, my real awakening came at eighteen. One night, in our Sands Street Church, a preacher, whom I never heard before and have never heard since, asked me: 'Are you a Bible Christian?' He put that question to no one else. To be a Bible Christian, according to the teaching of my Church, meant to give up my box at the opera, immoderate reading of novels of the day, attendance at worldly entertainments, love of dress; it meant, too, surrender of many dear companions. I thought it all over that night, and morning found me resolved. I lost no time in committing myself to the path I had chosen. Calling on my dearest friend, I said: 'I have come to bid you good-bye.' She asked, in surprise: 'Are you going away?' 'I am going to heaven,' I answered. 'Are you not coming to see me any more?' she questioned. 'No. You would only hinder me, and I am not strong enough yet for that.' She burst into tears. 'I will go to heaven, too,' she said. I wanted the fully consecrated life and was eager to do the Master's work. I became a faithful attendant at class meetings, and such godly women as Mrs. Phoebe Palmer and Mrs. Langford were my guides. I asked my pastor to give me his hardest district for his field of labor; from my Heavenly Father, I received spiritual treasure for dispensing, from my earthly father, means for affording material relief; so opportunity for philanthropic work came to me early. But for the encouragement of those who are disheartened at making a late start in life, I will say that my widest field of usefulness opened up only after I was forty, before which period, I had never spoken on a platform or written a line for the press."

At twenty, Margaret McDonald married a Methodist minister, an itinerant, and worked with him in his charge. While he was stationed at Tarrytown, ladies of different denominations summering at their homes on the Hudson, gathered in his church for meditations, asking her to lead them; when they returned to the city, they wished the meetings continued in their town-houses; and thus her drawing-room work began twenty-five years ago, the first "Heart to Heart Talk" being held in the Stokes' mansion, on Madison avenue. In Mrs. Bottome's parlor, in 1886, the International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons, of which she is President, was organized; it now numbers 700,000 members, living all over the world; her words in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, translated into Japanese, will be read to the Margaret Bottome Circle in Yokohama. Her activities are manifold. She is President of the Woman's Branch of the International Medical Mission, president of an association of ladies maintaining a home for working girls, and president of the board which supports the Margaret Strachan Rescue Homes. The work nearest her heart is the Frank Bottome Memorial, a settlement sustained by the King's Daughters and started by her son, for whom it is named. Of her three living sons, two are clergymen, one a lawyer. Her only daughter "went to heaven" in early childhood. She has been a widow for several years.

Always the same result. No Losses—No Defaults.

Thousands loaned then. Millions now. This tells the story of care, prudence, good judgment, integrity. I invest your money as I do my own.

A SERMON ON A LEOPARD SKIN :

THE Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, of Hackensack, N. J., believes in illustrating his sermons by object-lessons which are taken from life. For example, if he selects as his text the familiar adage about the leopard changing his spots, he has a leopard skin placed in the pulpit in full view of the congregation, so that he merely has to point to it to show the truth of the quotation. When he desires to draw a lesson from the harvest field, he frequently has the church pulpit adorned with the product of tree, vine, and plant. One of Mr. Sanford's favorite texts is that relative to the withered tree which bore no fruit, and this is depicted by barren and bearing trees placed side by side, which form a striking contrast.

Mr. Sanford has been especially successful in his labors among the working classes, and is a strong temperance advocate. Some time ago, in thinking about an illustration to prove the evils and hardships resulting from the drink habit, he conceived the idea of a series of photographs representing what he terms the four bars. Not being able to obtain the pictures he wanted, he decided to assume himself the character of the one who fell by the wayside, and had photographs taken in the garb of a farmer resting against the first bar in the field after the day's toil. Then he went to a saloon, and had his picture taken as if about to take a glass of liquor at the bar to refresh himself. The next photograph showed him in the light of a criminal brought before the bar of justice to be sentenced as the result of intoxication; and the last represents him in a cell behind the prison bars. He entitled his discourse "The Four Bars."

"Better than the Best."

A critic of discernment says, in regard to our handsome premium book, the Hall of Fame: "It is the most comprehensive and the most readable work to appear upon this subject. I have read about everything that has been printed concerning our national Pantheon; and I see that nothing of real importance has been omitted in this volume, while much that one could hardly demand has been presented; as the sketches of great men whose names were placed in nomination for inscription in the 'Hall of Fame' and who narrowly missed election; and the sketches of women whose names, as determined by a large popular vote, may yet find place there. The book deals with almost every phase of life; and this quality makes it an exceptionally valuable addition to the family reading-table, where all tastes must be pleased. It should be in every library, public and private; and every neighborhood reading-circle should own one." This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

In another part of the paper we publish an appeal from Mrs. Bird, in behalf of the boys and girls of the East Side of New York. We are quite confident that many of our subscribers will take advantage of this opportunity to add to their own happiness by bringing a ray of sunshine into the life of some poor wail during the coming Christmas holidays.

The INGERSOLL Dollar Watch

ONE out of every thirty people in the United States carry an Ingersoll Dollar Watch and pin their faith to it. Would they do this if it was not a perfect timekeeper?

The two million people who buy Ingersoll Watches every year buy them because they bear the strongest guarantee for accurate time made by any watch-makers, and because those who have bought and carried them are loud in their praises.

If our factory were not the largest watch factory in the world, and our automatic machines more exact than any man's handiwork, we could not turn out 6,000 perfect watches every day—nor could we sell an Ingersoll for less than ten times the present price. If you want the best watch, ask any dealer for an Ingersoll and see that you get it. If you don't, send us a dollar and you will receive one by mail, prepaid. Booklet free.

PEOPLE WHO DISCOURAGE OTHERS*

The Right and Wrong Uses of a Pessimistic Attitude....

VERY grave is the responsibility taken by any one who discourages another from Christian effort. There may be circumstances in which it is wise to do so, in which it is a duty, but they are rare, and one need be very sure of the duty before uttering the discouraging words. In religion, as in other matters, discretion is needed as well as zeal. The wisdom of the serpent is to be combined with the harmlessness of the dove. The man who insists on pressing the claims of religion on people at unseasonable times, ought to be discouraged, because his untimely remarks may disgust the very people whom he seeks to attract. The man who reproves the wrongdoer with needless severity; the man who would compel people by force and law to follow the course he believes to be right, deserves to be discouraged. He may be right in the object he has in view, but he is wrong in his choice of means to achieve that object. Not every volunteer in Christ's service is entitled to encouragement. There is a goodness that is mischievous, because of the hostility that it needlessly provokes. The blustering, hectoring, virulent reformer, self-righteous and intolerant, often complains that the church does not sustain him in his work. It does not, because it has no sympathy with his methods, not because it lacks sympathy with his object. There are times when discouragement is good, and there are people who ought to be discouraged.

Seldom, however, do men need discouragement in Christian effort. There is very little of the zeal that would speak in season and out of season, in society today. The Christian is far too apt to be silent when he ought to speak, and to miss opportunities that might be turned to account. He is much more frequently found hiding his light under a bushel; hiding it so effectually that the world does not recognize him as a Christian, and does not know how much good he really gets out of his religion. There are times when a man might do great good by a few words of testimony, modestly and tactfully uttered. It would be a very serious and deplorable thing to discourage him from making the attempt. Or it may be that there is evil work being done to his knowledge, in leading people astray, and he feels it his duty to protest against it, and, if possible, to thwart the effort. It needs faith and courage at the beginning, but just then, the words of discouragement are often spoken which prevent the good being done.

The mischief of discouraging words is still more frequently done in the case of one who is trying to turn from his evil way. The struggle is necessarily a hard one, but it is often made harder than it need be, by discouragement. To tell a man who is trying to reform, that he is not likely to succeed, to treat him as an outcast indelibly stained by his sins, to refuse him the countenance and support that he has a right to expect from a follower of Him who came to save the lost, is to put new obstacles in a way that is already hard to travel. The Christian ought, by his very existence, to be a hopeful and a helpful man. He has good ground for uttering encouraging words. Uttered at the right moment, in the right spirit, they may be the means of keeping some heart from sinking, some faltering, struggling man from falling and giving up the conflict.

Still more frequently discouragement is given by the conduct of Christians. The gloomy face, the arrogant manner, the austere, Pharisaical demeanor, has hindered many a man from uniting himself with the church. On the other hand, the worldly Christian, who is found in the theatre or on the race-course, gives discouragement of another kind. He practically tells the world that his religion does not afford him the enjoyment that he needs; and that it is not the controlling, inspiring thing that it professes to be.

FIDELITY REWARDED

Ruth's Affection for Naomi Brings her into Israel

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE history of Ruth is deeply interesting teaching; and as a type of the Church, taken out from the Gentiles, it touches us most closely. There was a famine in the land, not by accident. It was when Israel turned away to serve other gods that the Lord "shut up the heaven that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit" (Deut. 11: 16, 17). David counted it no accident, but a cause to inquire of the Lord, when "there was a famine in the land three years, year after year" (II. Sam. 21: 1). Elimelech of Bethlehem-judah, with his wife and two sons, sought to better themselves by going into the land of Moab. This was self-help, instead of dependence upon the Lord. It did not answer. First the sons married Moabitish wives, contrary to the command of God (Deut. 23: 3-6), and, of course, idolatry came with them into the family. Want of faith opened the door to the worship of other gods, and then death supervened. First Elimelech died, then the two sons, and Naomi was left a widow with her two Moabitish daughters-in-law. But the time of sorrow is the time of God's drawing near. He let the tidings reach the Israelitish widow that God had visited his people, in giving them bread. "Then she arose," and turned her steps towards the Lord's land, of which he says, "Dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."

There was a warm tie of affection between the old widow and the two young ones; they had a mutual sorrow, and sorrow often brings hearts very close. They went with her; but soon she remonstrated with them, that all their prospects of remarriage would be at an end if they followed her into the Lord's land. Orpah made a feeble resistance to her request, and turned back to her people and unto her god. But Ruth clave to her.

There was much of grace in this heathen-born Moabite. She must long have sought after what was real; she must have heard from Naomi of her sin in forsaking the land which God had given to his people and in doubting him; and, doubtless, Naomi had told her that the hand of death in the family was God's chastisement for sin. And Ruth, who was called of God, understood the holiness of this just God, and was attracted towards him, and ready to forsake all for him. "God do so to me, and more also," she said, "if aught but death part thee and me." Naomi is a type of the backsliding people of Israel; Ruth of the Gentile Church, called in the days of Israel's deep declension.

Naomi returned to Bethlehem, but besought her neighbors to call her by another name: Mara (bitter). "For," she said, "the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me." It was harvest time; and Naomi remembered that Boaz, a man of great wealth, was a kinsman of her late husband. Ruth begged her mother-in-law to sanction her going to join the gleaners. "Go, my daughter," was the old widow's reply. And Ruth went out and happened to glean in the field of Boaz, who took notice of her, asked who she was, called her "Daughter" (Ruth 2: 8), and bade her remain, and glean in no other field, and all her wants should be supplied. Ruth was overcome with this unexpected favor; she did not take it as a matter of course; it penetrated her heart, and she fell upon her face, and said, "Why have I found grace in thy sight, seeing I am a stranger?" And then she found she was no stranger; this great man had heard of her devotion to Naomi and of her faith in God, and he gave her his blessing. "The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust" (Ruth 2: 9-12). This was the point: Ruth trusted in the God of Israel, and Boaz was conscious of it. The difference between Jew and Gentile was broken down by one common faith.

And Ruth took the corn she had gleaned back to her mother-in-law, and joy came into the old widow's heart when she saw the plentiful provision, and a great light dawned upon her.

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.
